In 1507 a Prussian, one Copernicus, wrote a book on the "Revolutions of the Heavenly Bodies." Knowing how fiercely the church had set its face against scientific enlightenment, and dreading its ferocious punishments, he postponed the publication of his book for thirty-six years. It was written in the most conciliating style and courteous manner.

Nothing was stated positivly. He even apologized to the church by stating that he had only written his book to see if by placing the sun in the center, and supposing the planets to revolve around him, a better solution of the revolution of celestial orbs could be found.

The fate of the book was what might hav been expected. It was prohibited by decree of the church, and denounced as that "false Pythagorean doctrin, contrary to scripture, and calculated to turn the attention away from God. It was better for men to keep their eyes on a book written by God, and secure heaven, than to turn their attention to books written by men and fall into hell."

The Christian of to-day will tell you that if he had lived in the time of Copernicus he would hav had no hand in his persecution. But the fact that the smoke of the battle between the church and the science of geology has not yet cleared away shows that the conflict is not yet ended. Every church-member will fight for his church. Whenever the ramshackled leaders giv the signal, all will act as butters, down to the smallest lambs in the flock.

The mobs which murdered Lovejoy and sought the life of Garrison and others who struck for human rights were Christian mobs. The spirit which imprisoned Bennett and Kneeland, and many others, was born of the church. Comstock, the human tiger, is sustained in his nefarious work by the power of the church. Nothing short of the cruel system of Christian training could transform a human being into such a monster. The boy's description of his dog will apply equally well to Comstock and a great many other Christian persecutors—"one-half bull terrier and the other half common dog."

The howl of Talmage against what he was pleased to call the Infidelity of Theodore Parker has not yet died away; nor is the carnivorous disposition which he manifested toward Colonel Ingersoll yet forgotten.

Persecution and proscription will never cease as long as men are taught to regard the barbarous teachings of the Bible as holy. JOHN PECK.

Among the Mountains of Montana.

This land is all that my imagination had painted. All my life hav I desired to see the Rocky Mountains, and now I look out on their snow-capped summits on this 6th day of September, as I sit writing this. For nearly a week I hav been living on beautiful and sublime scenery, with three square meals on the Northern Pacific dining-car thrown in.

To do full justice to the long journey I hav just had would require a book. I think I hear some of your readers say, "Don't." Well, I won't.

Hitherto I hav had to be content with descriptions of this wonderland—there, there, I'll not tantalize you, but I almost seem to be bubbling, like the hundreds of mountain streams which I hav seen.

The air is full of Liberalism—this pure mountain air. Cattle on a thousand hills, and the Lord does not own one of them. As our train sped by I saw flocks of sheep which made me wish for a peaceful pastoral life.

I was greeted by a good audience, notwithstanding the inclemency of the night. Judging by my last night's reception, I will hav a successful season in Butte, a city which I am told numbers twenty thousand. I then will be in Bozeman for a month. Our poetic friend, Putnam, has done good service in this region. The Secular Union can do no better than to reëlect him secretary. He is a live worker. That is just what Liberalism needs. I am rejoiced to see the fraternal spirit that exists among our lecturers. Such is the "gospel" of Liberalism; its tendency is toward universal good-will as well as universal mental liberty.

Yesterday forenoon I went to hear the Catholic priest preach. He gave a very able discourse against Atheism, Infidelity, Protestantism, and heathenism. I felt sorry for our Protestant friends, on account of their being found in such company. The Catholic preacher told us that Protestants are not Christians, but really Infidels. There is only one true church, and that is the Catholic. The gentleman is an eloquent speaker, and at some of his hits on the Protestant ministers the people laughed loudly. Yes, Catholicism is logical Christianity.

From time to time I will drop you a few lines to let you know of the progress here.

Knights of Labor.

So it appears Powderly has had the ambition to answer a double purpose in the great enterprise he still so activly leads—giving occasion for the quotation ranking him with Cæsar:

> Why, man, he doth bestride this narrow world
> Like a huge colossus—

that is, the world of the great agitation of the workshop. He not only seeks to mobilize labor, giving its thousands compact organisms, and with watchwords, countersigns, and disciplin render them an effectiv, nimble power, ready to advance or retire where and whenever in his wisdom he may see fit, but, greater still, doing so all for the glory of God and the holy Catholic church; thus enabling him to call to his aid all the saints in the calendar, from the first in the sacred register to the last name on the holy roster of the canonized; and, as auxiliaries to them, all of the hosts of heavenly cherubim and seraphim, as led by archangel Michael, when, panoplied in shining arms, he moved them

> In square, in crescent, and in phalanx firm, victoriously against the embattled legions of

> Auld Hornie, Satan, Nick, or Clootie, and sent them, beaten, down, down to sheol,

> Whaur damnèd deevils roar and yell,
> Chained to a stake.

Great is Powderly of the Knights of Labor, and Pope Pius is his prophet! But, great though he is, in undertaking so much he will fail. That is, he will fail as an individual, while the cause he now leads will go on, adding to its vitality and directing power until labor, worthily marshaled, shall hav an acknowledged status in the commonwealth, perhaps be the principal factor in the management of the government. To that end, at least, my humble endeavors will point.

It may be said, Powderly might at least be spared the ridicule of the railer, the mortification of his coming defeat being enough and to spare in the premises. That certainly ought to hav weight in discussing an ordinary failure, but, under the circumstances, reprobation cannot be too strongly expressed, especially so when using the columns of a paper the aim of which is the overthrow of the power of the church the offender seeks to advance. It must be remembered, too, that in seeking to drag the master from his pedestal I would pull down an idol which I had placed in the pantheon of my best aspirations. So great was my admiration for the man that I thought of sending for a lithograph likeness of him. I had the fullest confidence in his capacity as a leader. He was to me the right man in the right place; a man who, above all others, I could point to with pride as the man of the hour in the position he now occupies, general master workman of the Knights of Labor.

And here I am made to pause appalled at the hint, which, like a slimy reptile of the stagnant marsh, slides into mental view suggested by dwelling on the treason theme I hav been discussing. What if Henry George or John Swinton, the noblest Romans of them all, should—away with the foul thought!

I can imagin a man of transcendent qualities unbosoming himself in humble deference to another, seeking to share his sympathy in his efforts to forward an enterprise entered into for the general good. Merit and humility are not, as are vice and virtue, antitheses. To submit to a friend the innermost workings of an organized movement, the members of which had honored him by his selection as their chief, might be justifiable, even when under a vow of secrecy. Torquemada, of the Spanish Inquisition, may hav had his adviser; so, too, Diego Deza; so also Cardinal Jeminez Cisneros; so Adrian Florencia, all of whom, in their obedience to the holy father, so liberally furnished victims for the glory and honor of the church of St. Peter. Why, then, deny to Powderly the same privilege? Like the worthies above named his first duty he felt was to the pope. If not advancing the glory and honor of the church, the organization above all others owning his allegiance, his elevation to the leadership of the Knights of Labor was as nothing. He sought the bishop, whom, above all others as authority, he was bound to be guided by as an aspirant for church honors, hopeful of having the organization he led acknowledged as an appanage of popedom and be bestowed upon him as the youngest son of the royal ecclesiastical family of Christendom. 'Rah for Powd!

The public is informed that the great secular acolyte will issue his first "message" to the order at the coming convention. Pronunciamento, perhaps, ought to hav been the preferred word; or, better still, encyclical letter.

To come down to the brass, I am inclined to think that the disclosure made by Stevens will prove to be anything but a boom for the grand master; that instead of a reëlection to the dignity he has thus far, without doubt, so well maintained, he will find himself relegated to the ranks, giving him occasion to take the cue of the archbishop of Shakespere (or Bacon) and exclaim:

> O Knights of Labor! had I served the cause
> With half the zeal I sought to serve the pope,
> You would not thus hav left me naked
> To mine enemies.

"A man's first duty is to the church" is the fallacy par excellence of the priesthood, and doubtless was the string harped upon by Powderly's pal, the bishop; and in proportion to the degree of the influence exercised on the Knights of Labor would be the swag falling as share to the altar, strengthening the theocratic element in the government of the nation, an element idle, ravenous, cruel.

Another fallacy well sustained by the common mind finds expression in the words, "A man's first duty is to his family." In a proper state of society there would be no need of extra personal endeavor to meet wants, a practical realization of the central motto of the Knights of Labor making all workers equal claimants on life's necessaries. "An injury to one is the concern of all" makes common claims to man, woman, and child alike. In our present heterogeneous methods of life, claims are restricted, only the grabber having the ticket that insures a seat at the table of plenty—the cunning grabber or the muscular one—all others must deferentially stand back waiting for the crumbs. To giv a man a hundred millions for recognized services while another is apportioned merely a stinted living, shows the unfinished condition of our system. While the idiotic theory is maintained that brain work, as it is called, should giv the individual an unlimited supply, just so long will so much of what is needed by the ungifted many be withheld to glut the minority. There is no feature of civilization that calls for the wisdom that comes of discussion more than does this. While the diocy holds sway, suffering, misery, injustice, will boom; the ash-barrel will be ransacked for food; the tenement, the basement, the poorhouse, and the jail resorted to for shelter; while rags will clothe the body, and ignorance and beastly superstition will rule the mind.

A man's first duty is to the community. That is the true sentiment. Charity is a snare; the altar a foolishness; heaven a fraud in view of the claims of life. What need is there of charity in a land teeming with plenty? Why genuflect and maunder before an altar when science stands ready to open up the secrets of her stores? Why dream of the unknowable when the knowable can be so delightfully realized?

> Why this longing, why forever sighing
> For the far off, the unattained and dim,
> While around thee the beautiful is lying,
> Offering up its low perpetual hymn?

I would close here but for a question suggested by the words, the "ungifted many." Is not brain work, as understood, the result of the school-house more than it is due to individual aptitude? If so, then education empties out that very empty argument in favor of high salaries. So much are we the victims of old-time fallacies that we deferentially uncap to authority, shouting when the Cæsar of the ballot-box passes, and falling back at the movement of the baton wielded by the mound of brawn buttoned and starred for easy recognition, yclept a cop. How much we need Saint George—I mean Henry—to slay that dragon of the city, at least to keep it in its proper place. Giv us Henry George as mayor of the city. Here endeth the present lesson. And now may the grace of God and the fellowship of the holy spirit be with you and abide with you till election day. Amen. J. M.

Call for the Tenth Annual Congress.

To the Auxiliary Secular Unions and to all Citizens of the United States and Canadas who support the Nine Demands of Liberalism:

You are invited to attend the Tenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, to be held in New York city, at Chickering Hall, Fifth avenue and 18th street, on November 11th, 12th, and 13th, and also on Sunday evening, the 14th, a lecture by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, which concludes the Congress.

Pursuant to a vote of the last Congress, notice is hereby given that the following amendments to the constitution of the Union will be acted upon: 1. To reduce the fee for life-membership from $25 to $10. 2. Or, on payment of $10 by applicant for membership, to authorize the secretary to issue ten-year membership certificates, with all the privileges of life-membership during that time. 3. Whenever a man or woman has taken out annual membership certificates for three or five consecutiv years, such person thereafter on payment of annual-membership fee to possess the privilege of life-membership.

The Congress will also be called upon to consider measures for carrying on the work of Freethought, and securing the adoption of such laws by the various state governments and by the national government, as shall make the United States thoroughly Secular, and the repeal of all laws now on the statute-books which conflict with the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

Local auxiliary Unions are entitled by the Union constitution to five representativs in the Congress—the president and secretary and three delegates. All charter-members and life-members, all vice-presidents, all chairmen of state executiv committees, are entitled to seats and votes in the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats but not votes, except by permission of the Congress.

It is hoped that every auxiliary Union will send a full delegation to the Congress, and that every Freethinker in the United States and Canada, who can, will be present.

Per order of board of directors:

R. G. INGERSOLL, President.
SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Secretary.
COURTLANDT PALMER, Treasurer.

News and Notes.

As I stepped from the train at Cromwell, Iowa, I was greeted by those good friends, F. I. Green and Jacob Geier, who helped me fire some of the first guns of the campaign, when the "winds of March were blowing," and a big snow-storm came. It was summer now, and the skies were fair.

F. I. Green is one of our best workers in this part of the country. He is a true Infidel, and he keeps things a-going. When the opportunity offers he pours hot shot into the enemy's camp. Through his efforts Remsburg has been before me in this field and done his usual effectiv work, and I found myself in a congenial atmosphere. I went to the farm-house of Mr. Geier, and found everything comfortable, and I enjoyed the quiet and luxury. Close by his house is a beautiful grove, and in it swings a hammock, and I found a delicious retreat from the hot sun, which, when I arrived, was pouring down its burning rays. Here I slept and dreamed amid the shadows and the music, and as I gazed upon the effulgent landscape about me I might imagin that I was amid the "isles of Greece," and that I had come to some lovely temple and haunted wood. Mr. and Mrs. Geier are stanch Liberals, and so also are the little children, George and Mattie Geier, and the baby also, with its sweet face and bright eyes, whose name is Edna Elizabeth; and I will put it on the roll, that she may hereafter see in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER how early she was on the campaign list. And Miss Hattie Babbitt belongs also to the same company. Although she has yet considerable Methodist fervor and, like the old preacher, is inclined to come out on the Lord's "side," yet she has too much sympathy with the sunshine and flowers to remain in the underground of orthodoxy with its showers of grace. So we had a good Freethought circle, and, Mr. Green being with us, the tide of time was brilliant, not only with the descending sun, but with the glow of reason and progress, and thus with a hearty supper the "inner man" was amply prepared to meet the onset of the "evangelicals," who had just pitched their tent in Cromwell, and were preaching and praying and singing to keep away the "devil," as they termed the Freethought lecturer. However, the hall was full, although the black clouds began to sweep the sky and it looked like rain, and this threatening aspect prevented many coming from a distance. By morning the clouds had full sway and rolled heavily over, and the rain came down as if it meant to make up for its long absence. By night, Wednesday, Sept. 8th, the roads were quite muddy and the heavens still dark. The lights gleamed fitfully in the fluttering tent of the "evangelicals," and Christians were few and far between, while our hall was more than half full, in spite of the gloomy weather. Mrs. Almeda Green, the mother of F. I. Green, from whom he got so much fire of Liberalism, and her sister, Mrs. Theresa Trueman, and her daughter, a bright young Liberal—all these came twelve miles to attend the lecture. This shows what a woman can do when she makes up her mind, and such are the women that giv glory and inspiration to the work of Freethought and make victory certain. Although my audience was not large, I enjoyed speaking to so earnest a number of Liberals, and I feel that Cromwell givs a good sign for our cause. Dr. Bailey, Mr. Johnson, Mr. Cressell, James Beck, Mr. Wright, and others are generous supporters of Freethought, and it will always be a delight to me to come to this camping-ground. Rain or shine, I know our banners will fly.

On from Cromwell via freight trains, etc., I come to Leon; and here I find that dauntless pioneer, John L. Long, who keeps up a lively campaign in Decatur county, although his forces are not very numerous—but they are constantly increasing. He took me out to Pine Grove Farm, his home, which is a kind of Freethought paradise, with his wife and three children to grace it, who are bright as sunbeams. The little baby was born since I was here last spring, and it was a delight to take the wonderful child in my arms and try to read the message of its beautiful eyes. Babies know so much—if they only would or could tell all they see! I do like babies, no matter how much they cry. They hav a right to cry. Are they not born Infidels and rebels? I rejoice in their spunk, and that they make things lively until suited and justice is done to their "demands." I wish we older Liberals could keep up as splendid a campaign as these tiny revolutionists who are soon masters of the situation. I believe in the baby, and in the music of its lungs. If it were not for the babies, what miserable conservativs we all should be! If it were not for their smiles and dimples and innocent eyes, where should we get courage for the battle of life?

I lectured Thursday evening in the school-house at Whitehall. It was full, and "The New Heaven and Earth" was, I believe, the first Freethought lecture ever given in this place. I spent the night with W. E. Gammon, who is one of our pioneers in this country. He livs at Eden Prairies Farm. This township was called Eden by the first settlers from Missouri because it was so beautiful and wild honey was so abundant. Mr. Gammon has been a citizen here for over thirty years. He has reared a good family of Liberals—five daughters and a son. One of his daughters is the wife of friend Long, and we can see what a temple of Freethought his home must be, with so much heredity in his favor.

The next day, Friday, September 10th, was one of the loveliest days of the season. The rains had made everything fresh and clean, and the atmosphere was shining like silver, and the earth was gemmed with mingling gold and emerald. The trees were glistening as if their thousand leaves had been touched with diamonds, and softest music flowed from the immeasurable brightness. It was a day for dreams, for happy dreams; and dream I did, and air-castles came and went to the rhythm of my enchanted soul.

In the evening I lectured at the opera house at Leon, which was nearly full. Those who came listened attentivly to what I had to say. A Secular Union will be formed here, and with the earnest friends engaged in it there will be effectiv work. The Long brothers, all stanch Liberals; Mr. Gammon; Mr. Allpaugh; Mr. Hall; Mr. Garrettson, whose hospitality I also enjoyed, and others, together with their families, all of the best men and women of the community, will surely make Freethought in this place and vicinity a great moral and social power, as well as intellectual illumination.

I am now at Ottumwa, a bright and busy place with a fine Liberal element and a growing organization, which includes both Spiritualists and Materialists, and is at the front of reform and progress, taking in all that is humanitarian. I arrived here Saturday and was met by our cordial coworker, William Lindsey, who is always ready with heart and hand for the service of freedom. I lectured here Sunday morning and evening to good houses. I was introduced by my old friend, R. L. Tilton, who is one of the leading citizens of Ottumwa. We all know the Tilton family and what bright Freethought blood and brain they hav. Tilton and I used to go to s cool together ta Pembroke, N. H. Ah! the wonderful days when I first went to that academy! I was a dreamy youth then, and all the world was music. The glorious autumn hours went by on wings of fire. It was a rare delight to sit with my old friend, and, after ten thousand hardships, talk over those school-boy days and recall the paradise of youth, as living to-day as ever in the magic halls of memory. I like Ottumwa. Our friends work on in spite of many discouragements. Mr. and Mrs. W. F. McCarroll are our courageous leaders here. They never giv up, whatever may be the fortune of war. The standard is never lowered, and from year to year it advances and hights of progress are gained. And generous co-laborers with these are Mrs. Phillips, Mr. Bolton, Mr. Wagg, Mr. Winn, Mrs. Peters and Mr. Clay Peters, Mrs. Millersack, Mrs. Rosenkrans, and others; and with such supporters of the cause it cannot fail.

I was pleased to meet Mrs. Cramer, daughter of Mrs. Rice, of "Lone Ranch," Longmont, Col., where I spent some happy hours, and thus Iowa and Colorado were linked in pleasant association.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Kilby, Miss Phœbe McCarroll, Miss Edna Douglass, Mrs. Emma Kilby, furnished delightful singing for the meetings, and I must thank them for giving me such glorious inspirations to say the best I could.

Miss Katie Kemm recited "Why Don't He Lend a Hand?" and what greater pleasure can there be than to hav the music of one's own heart thus felicitously expressed in the skillful interpretation of another's mind and voice?

It was my pleasure to announce that Professor Peck and Mrs. Lake would lecture at Ottumwa the next two Sundays. I rejoice that these untiring reformers are still at work, and "ring out the old, ring in the new," with merry music and mystic readings of the inmost heart of man and woman. They hav my warmest wishes for success in their arduous labors.

As I jumped off the train at Cedar Rapids, where I was obliged to stay all night on my way to West Union, I was heartily greeted by Warren Goddard, a TRUTH SEEKER subscriber, who was on the lookout to waylay me as I crossed his track, and he made my sojourn at a strange place quite pleasant. He was formerly of North Platte, where I was in the Unitarian pioneer service, and his wife used to attend my meetings there. So we could talk over old times. I also met Mr. Bedner, another subscriber, and I hope that friends will some time arrange for a lecture at this point, for I hav no doubt there is a large Liberal element in Cedar Rapids.

Another surprise awaited me. I came across, at the opera house, my old friend Gustave Frankel, who is in the full flush of professional success, and is winning golden opinions as one of the best actors on the stage. He has made a brilliant hit, and may fortune attend him, for he deserves it. He comes of that splendid radical family, the Frankels, of Newark, of which Joe Frankel is a member, who is known as one of the founders and first president of the Newark Liberal League. It was pleasant in the romantic world of art to thus greet the Infidel brother, whom you thought a thousand miles away. Hurrah for fate, I say! It does us a good turn now and then.

I am at this moment speeding to West Union. I lecture there this evening and two following evenings, and at Chebanse next Sunday, Sept. 19th. I shall be at Chicago until Sept. 26th; at Belding, Mich., Sept. 28th, 29th; at West Union, Ohio, Oct. 1st, 2d, 3d; and at New York, Oct. 4th.

An Important Matter Explained.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In noting the discontinuance of Mr. Appleton's editorials in Liberty, and the cause thereof, you say: "Mr. Tucker goes at the state; Mr. Appleton at authority per se." This does not correctly state the difference between Mr. Appleton and myself. The article in which I announced the change in Mr. Appleton's relations to Liberty contained this sentence: "Liberty's position [and my own, of course] is that, of the really serious and important acts of invasion of individual sovereignty, at least nine-tenths are committed by organized state governments, or through privileges granted by them, and that the governmental idea, with the state as its principal embodiment, is the efficient cause of almost all our social evils." Since I assail the governmental idea, my battle, no less than Mr. Appleton's, is against authority per se. The real differenee between us is this: I hold the state to be the necessary, principal, and almost sole instrument of authority, and so make it the center of my attack; while Mr. Appleton holds that authority exercises most of its power outside of the state, and so fights on other lines.

Boston, Sept. 19, 1886. BENJ. R. TUCKER.

The God of Civilization.

It is part of the business of the church to hold up the heathen to pity; to picture him as worshiping false gods; to send missionaries to reclaim him and turn him to the worship of "our" God, the only original God. Let me premis my remarks by denying the right of church people to impute to any or all dissenters egotism, intellectual vanity, and a desire to appear superior to the millions who adhere to religion. If a man, led by his natural gift of reason, attempts to inquire into the "scheme of salvation," and asks reasonable questions in regard thereto, instead of receiving a valid reply, he is called conceited and puffed up with his own importance for daring to doubt the infallibility of scripture doctrins.

As the church has recently taken a bold stand in its menacing attitude toward labor organizations, it may not be amiss to open its book and glance at its claim to divinity, to truth; and to its claim of authority in matters carnal as well as spiritual.

The ancient heathens, moved by an impulse of awe at the immensity of creation, created out of their imaginings various gods, to whom were given all the attributes of divinity, and before whom they bowed with real feelings of superstitious worship just the same as Christians to-day bow before their only original God. Now, it is to the relativ merits of the heathen gods and the God of civilization that I desire to call especial attention. Most heathen gods were modeled from animals. Few hav a "scheme of salvation;" but, coming in direct and personal contact and intercourse with their gods, the only requisits to propitiation appear to hav been self-immolation and abasement. The God of civilization also appears to hav an animal as its model, and it is surely a small compliment to man that he was the unfortunate animal selected. Not in the most barbaric age of the world, nor in its bloodiest and most cruel epoch, has there lived a man capable of the atrocities and the eternal cruelties which characterize the God of civilization and the Bible.

It is beyond human credulity that any revenge, hate, and malice which ever actuated any man would follow his victim beyond the penalty of death.

Yet here we hav a God given to us of whom it is recorded that he did, with malice aforethought, create millions of beings, knowing full well that a large proportion of them would be cast into an eternal hell. But, however, being moved to a little pity, he detaches a part of himself and sends it down to be born of the Virgin Mary; to be crucified, dead, and buried; and to ascend to heaven and to sit on his right hand to be the judge of the quick and the dead. And this God is claimed to be the creator of the universe! It is an insult to the great creativ cause of life. No God of that description had any part in the creation of the universe.

Again, we may ask, How is it possible for the creator to hav a cause for anger and hatred of anything in the wide domain of his creation? Admitting, for the sake of argument, that he could get angry, what particular benefit accrues to him by eternally roasting millions of poor devils that he made and making a heaven for the saintly minority who were smart enough to accept the Bible and believe in it? The absurdity of the "scheme" ought to be apparent at once when we remember that the author of all things could with a wave of his hand blot out from the face of the earth all misbelievers, and in their stead create a race that would eternally worship him and sing his praises. Again, we meet the more monstrous absurdity that such omnipotence made us to crawl before him, to flatter him in one breath and in the next to tell him what a poor, miserable job he made of it when he manufactured us; and that we don't think much of this world that he gave us to liv in anyhow, but are making great reckoning on the next one, and want to go there terribly bad—but if it is all the same to him we would a "leetle" rather stay here just as long as possible, as bad and wicked as it is. Now, between the gods of the heathen and the God of the Bible, we think the former the more sensible of the two. They hav no red tape, no preliminary formalities, no savior, pope, or priest to conciliate or to fee, but the communication is direct, and the spiritual satisfaction just as ample. Both are the outcome of superstitious fear, and are relics of the ignorant past. Both are crumbling to decay before the dawn of reason's sun, which, illuminating the conscience of men, will teach that to deserve a better world than this we must not decry it, but, unfolding its hidden beauties, its harvests, its fruits, so fix the social economy of our lives that all may partake thereof and be led to say: "Lo! that which we called hell is a heaven indeed. Nature is a generous giver—why niggards we?"

Nature is the direct handiwork of the almighty creator, and, if we would be in accord with him, we must find a charity in our hearts as broad and universal as the bounty of nature.

Creeds are cold and formal avowals of belief; prayers are selfish petitions born of fear. Neither of them inspire the heart with love—a love that impels a tear of pity for the oppressed and suffering ones of earth. Injustice, political and social, may wreak its venom upon thousands; by scores they may drop into premature graves; but the church bells toll on, the litany is read, the sin is confessed, forgivness assured, and not hand or voice is raised to succor those whose lives are but dark and painful pilgrimages to the oblivion of death.

Religion should be love, but, alas! it is hate and malice and all uncharitableness. Each one looks out for himself. Each church is jealous of the other. Divided by differing creeds, they denounce one another. Each claims to hav the direct and only route to heaven, forgetting that heaven is a condition and not a locality. The echo of the cold, formal tones of the preachers and priests sounds the knell of hope to the oppressed, and tells them too well of the hollow mockery of the profession. WM. ALLEN SMITH.

Our London Letter.

In the current number of prophet Baxter's Christian Herald, portraits and biographies of Sam Jones and his assistant, Sam Small, are given; and, if the portraits are correct, these two professional revivalists appear to be smart Yankees who would make their money out of any particular line of business they fancied embarking upon. According to their biographer, they appear to hav been a couple of abandoned scoundrels, and, as is usually the case, hav consequently turned out to be unexceptionally eminent Christians. I don't know how it is, but if one is to go by the published accounts of those who are most fitted for everlasting glory, it is absolutely necessary to previously plunge into the lowest depths of infamy to attain any great degree of future happiness or to be of any good to one's fellow-creatures here. It is rather hard on a clean-living and peaceable individual that he is not likely to do any good to himself or anyone else either here or hereafter.

According to the biographical sketch, Jones possesses the eloquence of earnestness and action, the fire and glow of passion, surprises of thought, the wit, humor, ridicule, irony, sarcasm, invectiv, pathos, sympathy, love, humanity, and faith, besides the calling, spirit, gift, courage, directness, sympathy, faith, fervor, and flexibility, of a true evangelist; and then, to illustrate all these happy attributes, it givs a series of his stock anecdotes, which are just the same sort of thing all children who hav ever been sent to Sunday-school hav brought before their notice in little pamphlets. I remember reading these identical anecdotes years ago, and I quite fail to see any particular genius required or displayed in dragging such senseless anecdotes forward; but those who appreciate them are fond of the old, old story, and it would be too great a strain on their weak and small modicum of brains to listen to any new and original anecdote.

The same paper contains an interesting account of the result of faith on the part of Mrs. Susan Teeple, of Hotchkissville, United States, who broke her leg in 1866, had bronchitis and lung disease for many years, and was taken to bed in 1878, where she lay for three and a half years without moving. Just recently a brother went to the mercy-seat for her, with the result that, after twelve and one-half years' dumbness, she suddenly recovered her voice, the lung disease disappeared, and the leg was all right again, and the staff on which she had to lean while walking was given to Brother Davis (address not mentioned), who will no doubt testify to the above work of fiction.

Miss Ross, of Maungatua, who has been confined to her bed for sixteen years, had an interview on August 1st with a faith-healing medium, who ordered her to get up, which she at once did without the slightest difficulty. If such was the case, I should be inclined to believe she had been suffering from sixteen years' chronic laziness.

George Muller has just published his annual report of the orphanages of which he was the founder, from which it appears that since 1834 he has received the sum of £1,086,507, which he maintains was sent him solely in answer to prayer, totally ignoring his skilful method of advertising. He and his wife are making a tour of the world, and as he professes never to hav used any of the money sent him for the support of the orphans, it must be presumed that the Lord has opened a special account for his traveling expenses.

Grattan Guinness, who is great at the prophetic business, has published a book recording the signs of the approaching end of the age, and the speedy advent of Christ, but as the author charges a good sum for his books, it does not appear that he anticipates a very early advent, or he would not be so desirous of making such a respectable income and provision for his old age as he is now doing. But professional prophets only write for other people, and can scarcely be expected to believe their own tales.

What a nuisance missionaries and chaplains stationed abroad make of themselvs! One of them having been expelled from France for sending an address of condolence to the Duc d'Aumale, lately exiled, has tried through his friends to persuade the English government to take up the matter, and, to satisfy his wounded pride, would only be too happy to see the two nations at loggerheads. These persons hav such a vast sense of their own importance that they can not understand it when they are put on the same footing as other citizens or aliens. Christian missionaries hav been one of the greatest curses of the world. The evil caused by the drink traffic, though considerable, is comparativly nothing as against the other. Blood has ever followed in their footsteps, and if of late years the mischief has not been as great as formerly, it is not because of absence of the will but of the power. J. D.

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. REMSBURG has delivered thirty lectures in Minnesota and Wisconsin, and is now at work in Iowa. Large audiences greet him at nearly every place. One of the most successful meetings he has yet held was at Green Bay, Wis., Sept. 10th. The arrangements for this meeting were made by George Chamberlain, a veteran, seventy-eight years of age.

MR. J. L. ANDREW writes: "As I shall remain in the East until about Oct. 7th, I am desirous of lecturing in as many places as possible. All who desire Liberal lectures in their community may address me in care of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am also desirous of making a tour through Michigan, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. Liberals in these states may address me in care of Mr. Samuel Devenbaugh, Brimfield, Noble co., Ind."

W. F. JAMIESON is stirring up the Christians out in Montana. He has sent a challenge to the Rev. Jacob Ditzler, D.D., who happened to be traveling in Montana, and whom Jamieson has not met since their famous debate eight years ago in Kirksville, Mo. Dr. Ditzler signified his willingness for a debate, and it will probably take place in Renshaw's Opera House, beginning September 28th. Jamieson will lecture in Dillon three evenings before the debate, and in Bozeman the Sundays of October. Address him at Butte, Montana.

MR. CHARLES WATTS, since his arrival in this country from England at the end of last month, has lectured five times in Canada and twelve times in the States. The local press contained the following notices of his lectures in Hamilton and New Jersey: "The abilities of Mr. Watts as a Secularist orator are very well known. His audience last night was delighted, judging from the enthusiastic manner in which the lecture was received and the lecturer applauded. The lecture was full of the pithy expression, clever reasoning, fervent eloquence, and lively humor which distinguish Mr. Watts's oratory. No matter how radically his hearers may differ from him in opinion, those who go to hear him are always sure to be entertained and mentally stimulated" (Hamilton Spectator, September 8th). Referring to Mr. Watts, the Mount Holly, N. J., Herald of September 18th remarks: "He is a very eloquent and logical orator, and there was nothing offensiv or blasphemous in his remarks. He held the attention of his hearers closely, and all united in pronouncing him one of the finest speakers they ever listened to." After giving a course of lectures in Pittsburgh and Waynesburg, Mr. Watts will go to Grand Rapids, Mich., where he delivers five lectures. He then proceeds to Chicago, which will be his headquarters till early in November, when he returns East to be present at the great Convention of the American Secular Union in New York city. Friends in Illinois and Michigan wishing lectures from Mr. Watts during October should write him direct. His address for that month will be care of A. D. O'Neill, 107 Park ave., Chicago, Ill.

On the Side of Justice.

All through the Anarchists' trouble at Chicago, the old TRUTH SEEKER has given the fairest, best balanced, and most comprehensiv comment of any journal, not Anarchistic itself, that we hav seen. All considered, it is as nearly a representativ journal of freedom as can exist on a public patronage. —Equity.

Preaching and Practice.

"I am sorry to find you no better, Mrs. S.," said the minister to a sick parishioner, "but we must hope for the best. We must put our trust in him upon whom alone we can depend for health and strength. I will try and see you again before I go, and in the mean time I will pray——"

"Are you going away, Mr. Goodman?" inquired the invalid.

"Yes. The members of the church hav given me a trip to Europe, hoping that the sea voyage will giv me health and strength."—Sun.

Freethought in England.

I.

Freethought in England is growing apace. To adopt a phrase of Lord Randolph Churchill—the impudent and unscrupulous leader of the present Tory government—during the recent election, in reference to the Conservativs—I may say with truth that the Freethinkers are winning everywhere, in the battle between truth and error, "hands down," or, in other words, without effort.

Truth is learned by contrast with error; the rising generation, having been soundly educated, are inquiring into theology and religion, and finding to their amazement, and first doubtless to their regret, that they will square with neither the teachings of science nor with common sense. With a larger knowledge of the subject these inquirers are often driven to the conclusion that theology means ignorance of nature, and religion ignorance of humanity.

In the past theology expressed the limit of man's knowledge in regard to the phenomena of the universe. Man endeavored to scale nature's hights and fathom her depths, and when he had penetrated as far as he could he labeled all the rest with the word "God." Science has now extended nature illimitably; she is found to be boundless in extent, and from the indestructible character of matter and force, we are led to infer that she is also eternal in duration. English Freethinkers are of robust mind. Few shrink from the term "Atheist," though many prefer the new description of "Agnostic."

Mr. Bradlaugh called himself an "Atheist" early in his career as a Freethinker, when with sledge-hammer blows he carried on his iconoclastic work of slaying Christian Theism, and he does not readily change his views. But even he sometimes describes himself as a "Monist," which is a much more expressiv term; for while Atheism expresses the negativ attitude of his mind, Monism expresses the affirmativ side, which is much more important.

Mr. Bradlaugh's followers are Atheists to a man—I might say, to a boy—and so strong is the influence of their leader that, however poor and humble their position in life, they display an amount of courage in the advocacy of their opinions that is quite remarkable.

To be a Bradlaughite is to be known for one's earnestness and courage. Some years ago the junior member for Northampton declared that in his opinion a Freethinker who had brains enough would be certain to arrive at the Atheistic goal if he were only assiduous enough in his study. Many Freethinkers hav since felt that if they cannot conscientiously call themselvs "Atheists" they may be regarded by at least one prominent Freethinker as in some sense "intellectually deficient."

But there are a large and increasing number of Freethinkers in England and Scotland—but, alas! not in Ireland—who delight in the cognomen of "Agnostic." They say that whether there is a God or not, they hav only finite minds, and as all knowledge applies to phenomena, unless God is one of the manifold changes that are perpetually taking place—that is, unless deity is a phenomenon—they can take no cognizance of him. They are not Atheists, because they do not deny God; they merely declare themselvs to be without knowledge of him. As in the Greek, a-Theist merely means "without God," the difference between the Agnostic and the Atheist is so slight as to be hardly worth wrangling over.

Some, however, think otherwise, and the subject is thus made a perennial source of discussion. For my own part I prefer the term "Naturist," and if the theologians had not filled the skies with their imaginary gods there would hav been no need for Theists nor Atheists. Since Mr. Bradlaugh has taken his seat in Parliament he has not lectured very frequently on the Bible or on theology. No doubt he has strong grounds for lecturing principally upon politics. The public want to know what his opinions on the various political questions of the hour are, and, in my view, he is quite right in taking every opportunity of making them known. Moreover, he does Freethought good service by occasionally lecturing on "Religions—Old and New," and demonstrating their manifold difficulties and absurdities on the Sunday afternoons when he visits the provinces. It is a singular fact that Mr. Bradlaugh has many political admirers who would not suffer themselvs to listen to a Freethought lecture from him lest they might be persuaded to become "not almost" but quite Infidels.

I once heard an old gentleman say: "I heard Mr. Bradlaugh last night, on the Irish question, and if he reasons with equal force on theology I should be afraid to hear him, for he would so disturb my beliefs, which are a source of consolation to me, that I should go down to the grave a miserable man."

Of course I disabused the gentleman's mind of this error. I told him that I could understand him being miserable on the brink of the grave if he believed that the large majority of mankind would be consigned to eternal torture, but I assured him that if he once got that theological error removed from his mind, it was wonderful how happy he might be, and how philosophically he might approach the real difficulties of life.

Undoubtedly Mr. Bradlaugh is a real orator; already he has made his influence felt in the House of Commons, but I long for the day to come when Lord Randolph Churchill or some other equally audacious Tory shall offer strong opposition to a measure of his, so that the highest dialectical qualities of the junior member for Northampton may be brought out, and then the house will understand completely the argumentativ giant with which they hav to deal in him.

Mrs. Besant's name has been so identified with that of Mr. Bradlaugh in the various struggles for intellectual liberty in which Freethinkers hav taken part, that it would be anything but gallant or respectful on my part to speak of other prominent Freethought advocates before her.

In addition to being a lady of wonderful scholastic attainments, and excellent argumentativ power, she is intellectually and morally fearless.

Recently she has reasoned herself into the acceptation of Socialism as the panacea of most of the evils to which human beings are subject in the present condition of society. With admirable courage, she has proclaimed her conviction whenever she has regarded her advocacy of Socialism useful in the columns of the journal of which she is co-editor (the National Reformer), regardless altogether of the consideration whether by so doing she was alienating Freethought friends who could not possibly accept her newly-adopted doctrins. But, as Mr. Foote, editor of the Freethinker—and, in my opinion, one of the most subtle and brilliant advocates of Freethought this century is likely to see—well observed a short time ago, "It is not very likely that Freethinkers, who hav suffered plenty of persecution themselvs will commence to persecute others for a 'social heresy.'" There is not much fear that Mrs. Besant will lose anything by the earnestness, courage, and enthusiasm she displays in the advocacy of her new faith.

My only wonder is that she regards Socialism as of chief importance, and Freethought as merely secondary; whereas, in my opinion, if Socialism were ever attainable, Freethinkers would be the fittest persons to bring it about.

Mrs. Besant is a great Freethought advocate, for all that, and frequently hammers away at the old theological dogmas, and the amount of work she is capable of getting through often astonishes even those who know her best. ARTHUR B. MOSS.

The American Press.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 28th Professor Bell, in a few well-chosen words, denounces the great dailies published in our great cities. It is to be regretted that the article does not specify more particularly the reasons for the professor's words. In the next week's paper, however, Dr. Severance, who never hesitates to "speak right out in meeting," in an article entitled, "Is This a Free Country?" condemns in strong terms the injustice of the papers in the late Anarchist trials in Chicago and Milwaukee.

The doctor says: "They hav misrepresented evidence, and lied outright, and thus hav misled honest people in regard to the facts." This statement is true, and for this reason Professor Bell, Mrs. Severance, and every Liberal who has been conversant with the facts feel the necessity of increasing the circulation of the Liberal papers.

When the despot Napoleon III. ruled France there was no freedom of the press, no voice of the people. Now and then some liberty-loving soul sent forth surreptitiously a few words of pitiful protest against the enslavement of the masses, crying for justice, and his reward was a dungeon in the Bastile. It was absolutely impossible for the people to make themselvs heard. And in Chicago, during the progress of the late Anarchist trial, not a single daily paper would publish a line demanding justice for these men. Not only this, but they would make misstatements calculated to injure the prisoners, and refuse to publish the refutation of their libelous words.

A free press is one of the greatest guardians of the people's liberty, but that is not a free press where one side of any question is suppressed. Letter after letter has been written to the dailies of this city, full of indignation, full of protest, full of burning words of liberty, and not one of them has been published. The press has become the voice of capital, the police the arm; and in America to-day we hav in this union a power as dangerous to the liberties of the people, and as despotic, as was ever Louis Napoleon with his perfectly trained police.

The only hope, then, for the future lies in the Liberal papers that dare publish the people's words. And the very fact that they dare publish the truth, where so much has been suppressed, will increase their circulation a thousandfold. Let every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, then, send in a new subscriber—not only one, but as many as he can secure. Let the publishers hav not only the satisfaction of feeling that they hav stood by the right, but that it pays to be just.

On Sunday, September 5th, a picnic was held at Sheffield, Ind., to raise funds for the continued defense of the Anarchists. Three thousand persons were on the ground, and many were left behind in Chicago with no means of transfer, not enough cars having been chartered. The excursion was a grand success, two thousand dollars being realized. A number of very enthusiastic speeches were made—incendiary, the papers said in the next morning's report; but this was not true.

Said Mrs. Parsons: "State's-Attorney Grinnell in his speech before the jury stated that he had the Socialists like rats on the rungs of a ladder, and that he would drive them into their hole. This meeting givs the lie to his statement. It would take a big hole to put them in, and a big cork to hold them in. (Immense cheering.) I do not wish, brothers, sisters, fellow-workers, to appeal to your passions. These men were your mouthpiece. It was your wrongs they were seeking to redress. It is for you, then, to demand that they be given justice; and if it goes on to the bitter end, if the crash of those seven scaffold-traps echoes through the land, may the people send forth a cry that all tyrants throughout the world shall hear, and hearing tremble." (Prolonged applause.)

For speaking these words a daily paper advised that Mrs. Parsons be rearrested, and yet P. J. Dusey, an Irish Catholic, who has been one of the most radical speakers on the labor question, and who was arrested after the so-called "Haymarket riot," and for some unexplained reason let go again, was present, and made a strong, telling speech, and his name is not even mentioned in the report of the meeting. Mrs. Parsons, her husband condemned, as she believes, unjustly, to be hung, her woman's soul smarting under the wrong, and her wifely heart tortured with the outrageous cruelty, pleads with tears in her eyes, and in tremulous tones, to the people to demand justice for her husband; and a barbarous paper, lost to all sense of tenderness or humanity, recommends that she share her husband's fate, and no words are said of the Irish Catholic, P. J. Dusey. He is to be congratulated upon his independence and manliness, but the question persistently presents itself, "Why this discrimination?" Is it, as has been claimed, that the Chicago police wanted no Irishmen among the arrested Anarchists or Socialists, and so all such hav been discharged, while poor Tom Brown has lain in Cook county jail nearly five months for lending Parsons five dollars? Mr. Dusey used the following words, which it will be seen are fully as incendiary as the language made use of by Mrs. Parsons: "The previous speaker has said that these men will not hang while there are two hundred and fifty thousand Germans in Chicago. I say they will not hang while there are one hundred and seventy-five thousand Irishmen in Chicago. The time was when it was the Irish in this country that were maligned and persecuted. To-day it is the Germans, and when the struggle comes the Irishmen will be found fighting in a line with the Germans." (Loud applause.)

A number of the leaders of the labor movement were present at this picnic, among them Mr. Louis Zeller, president of the Central Labor Union. Mr. Zeller furnished the following resolutions, which were passed at a meeting of the Central Labor Union, in response to the dictation of the Chicago police, that they should express no condemnation of the judge, jury, or verdict in the Anarchist trial:

WHEREAS, The Constitution of the United States givs each inhabitant the right to express his opinion in word and writing; and

WHEREAS, This right has never been denied to the property-owning classes, who hav during the last year made more than rightful use of the same; and

WHEREAS, That on this day, Sunday, the 22d of August, 1886, our police, through their representativs, hav forbidden us to say anything about the Anarchist trial, or to express our opinion in a resolution about it which might be in favor of the convicted, or to do anything which might cause an impartial revision of the verdict; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we condemn the action of the capitalistic press of Chicago, because it is inhuman, barbaric, and brutal, and it denies the right of the working class to express their free opinion, and is especially against foreigners, who hav worked more for the prosperity and glory of this country, who hav participated in all its wars more numerously, who hav sacrificed more, and shed more blood for this country than all know-nothings together, who are trying at present to cause a hatred against foreigners; and be it further

Resolved, That we hereby express our disapproval in regard to the conduction of the so-called Anarchist trial and declare that we consider the verdict partial, ancient, and barbaric, because it does not condemn the principal or accessory of a crime, but only the exponents of political ideas. Be it therefore

Resolved, That we will use all legal means to procure an impartial execution of the law.

THE CENTRAL LABOR UNION OF CHICAGO.

An article in a Christian temperance paper recently published in Chicago contained the following words:

It is estimated that tens of thousands of workingmen spend one-half their wages in saloons. The working classes spend from four to five hundred million dollars annually for drink. No wonder we hav Anarchy, strikes, riots, and threatened revolutions. Destroy the saloons and it won't be long till the American laborer will be a householder. Destroy the saloons and you deprive the brutal Anarchist of his devilish inspiration.

In another part of the same paper, with an amazing, refreshing, and ingenious candor, the following admissions are made:

Five years ago liquor was unknown among the tribes of the Congo basin, but recently one hundred thousand gallons of New England rum and one missionary were sent over in the same vessel.

Before the ports of Japan were opened to the Christian nations of the world, there were only eleven intoxicant drinks known in the country; now there are more than two hundred, and many horrible vices peculiar to highly civilized nations are becoming common in Japan.

According, then, to the logic of this Christian paper, the deductions of which Whateley himself could not evade, where there is no Christianity there is no rum; where there is no rum there is but little vice. Attacking saloons, then, condemning strikers, hanging Anarchists, is only dealing with effects.

Prohibit the cause, which, according to this temperance paper, is Christianity; for if with its introduction into heathen nations it has increased their intoxicating drinks from eleven to two hundred and familiarized the people with many heretofore unknown and horrible vices, is it not to be argued that intemperance and vice would decrease in this country in proportion as a belief in Christianity decreased?

And then another item in this same paper says:

It is estimated that sixty thousand gallons of wine are yearly consumed in the churches of the United States for sacramental purposes alone.

Do away with the church, and the pernicious influence of this so-called sacred, bloody rite will no longer be left to corrupt and vitiate the people with its revolting power.

Permit me to make a correction in my last letter. The purse proposed to be raised by wealthy citizens of Chicago for the jury condemning the Anarchists was one hundred thousand dollars instead of one thousand dollars, as printed.

The Chicago Secular Union, corner of Halstead and Madison streets, reopened Sunday, September 19th, Judge Page speaking on "The Origin of Life." Sunday, September 26th, Samuel P. Putnam lectures before the Union both afternoon and evening.

MRS. A. M. FREEMAN,
Secretary of Chicago Secular Union.

Le Seur's Dissection of the Rev. Dr. Porter.

If there had been a law for the prevention of cruelty to doctors of divinity and ex-presidents of colleges, it ought to be vigorously and rigorously enforced against Mr. W. D. Le Seur, a Canadian, I take it, who, in the Popular Science Monthly for September, has been practicing vivisection on poor old Dr. Noah Porter, the late president of Yale College. This venerable doctor of a sickly divinity, it seems, delivered an address last May before the Nineteenth Century Club, which must hav sounded at the time like an old lecture given twenty years ago to a class of sophomores, and vamped up to suit the present occasion, in which production the spirit of stat pro ratione voluntas superseded the necessity of giving reasons. The venerable president seemed to forget what the lapse of time, in this age of inquiry, does with men's opinions, and that the Nineteenth Century Club has a very different audience from that of the verdant youths of an American college, who, like a nest of young robins, open their mouths to their utmost capacity, and swallow down whatever is put into them. The cruel critic, Mr. Le Seur, shows, to the entire satisfaction of the reader, that his victim is almost as unacquainted with science, philosophy, and even grammar and rhetoric, as was his illustrious predecessor and namesake who sailed in the ark; that he undertook to discuss a subject which he did not understand; that he presumed on the credulity of his audience, and attempted to play the role of authority, as men of his cloth did in the eighteenth century. During the heat of the anti-slavery controversy, I knew a Presbyterian doctor of divinity and president of a college, who, in the same spirit evinced by Dr. Noah, attempted to crush out Abolitionism and the Abolitionists by authority, in a great speech delivered before a synod of clergymen, and afterward published in pamphlet form, in which he proved that slavery was a divine institution, and that the Abolitionists were Infidels. In this production he repeatedly used the phrase, "Pars sequitur ventrem," which any Latin scholar sees makes no sense. The doctor intended, no doubt, to avail himself of the legal maxim "Partus sequitur ventrem," which expresses, in the slave system, the legal status of a child born of a slave mother.

The blush was brought to the doctor's cheeks during a subsequent debate when a young man, not a doctor of divinity, but whose ears had been boxed some years before by a volume of Blackstone's Commentaries, pointed out the blunder and showed that the doctor did not understand the subject. In like manner the Rev. Dr. Noah uses the word protean, ignorant altogether, if not of its meaning, at least of its application to the subject of discussion. He had heard, evidently, something about protoplasm and protista, and from the similarity of the first syllable in *prot*ean, supposed that this word was used in discussing Mr. Darwin's theory of evolution. But by this time, no doubt, the reverend doctor has found out from his dictionary the character of his blunder.

My only object in this communication is to induce those of your readers who like to see an anatomical dissection in which the various parts of the subject are separated and laid bare, to read Mr. Le Seur's article in the Popular Science Monthly. Many a sensitiv author whose blunders and incompetency to discuss an important subject hav been so unmercifully pointed out would die of sheer mortification at the exposure. But Dr. Porter, being a Connecticut Yankee, and having long been nurtured on the mental, moral, and physical pabulum of that state, will, in all probability, survive and continue to flourish like a green bay-tree. But after reading Mr. Le Seur's criticism, a person is inclined to wonder what influence so mushy an intellect as that of Dr. Porter must hav exerted in shaping the minds of the hundreds of young men who were more or less under his plastic influence during his long presidency of Yale College.

Dr. York in Queensland.

DEAR FRIEND EUGENE, AND READERS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: You will learn by this that I am still on the warpath and in good health.

At the present writing I am in Gympie, a beautiful town in the gold field of Queensland, and hav had the honor of being the first to break the bread of common sense in this city, which is stupidly religious.

The parsons here, too cowardly to defend their castle, sent for H. A. Long, with whom I had previously debated six nights in Brisbane, and before us we hav kept the town hot during three weeks past. Last night was our eighth and last of the course, at which time we organized a Freethought union, with about sixty members, raked out from the ashes of a religious night which pervaded the town. Scotch Presbyterians, babies in hell, and Roman deviltry held despotic sway here, and the priests and parsons look upon me as Satan incarnate. The pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER set them wild. Eugene, these devils die hard, but the gods must go, and with them the domination of priests.

I go to Maryburough for four lectures, and then back to Brisbane for twelve Sundays more, making over thirty lectures in Brisbane.

My work in Queensland will close in November, after which I go to Melbourne for a short course. Then we—mother and I—hope to turn our faces toward the land of the Stars and Stripes, stopping one month at Auckland, New Zealand, on our way home, where we hope to arrive in January next. Freethought in the colonies is rapidly on the increase, and everywhere our labors hav been attended with good audiences and good results.

I am in receipt of THE TRUTH SEEKER and Boston Investigator, and am pleased to show them to our people here, but being so far away I find it difficult to get subscribers in Australia, but am quite sure that American literature is fast finding a permanent foothold in the colonies, which, ere long, will become a federated sisterhood of republican states like our own dear country.

You will find inclosed post order for two yearly subscriptions for THE TRUTH SEEKER, to be sent as directed in private letter, and the orders which I sent for books for the friends at Brisbane, by last mail, I trust are on the way by this time and hope they will arrive before I leave Brisbane.

With many and oft-repeated good wishes for the cause of mental liberty at home, and wishing to be kindly remembered by the friends and readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I am, as ever,

Yours for truth,
DR. J. L. YORK.

Liberalism and Anarchy.

As the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER are open to the wide world for the promotion of truth and justice, I desire to say a word or so about the question which has recently excited all America to a dangerous pitch, viz., Anarchism.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 4th, I notice an article from the pen of Mrs. A. M. Freeman. Mrs. Freeman is a strong advocate of the principles of free speech, Freethought, and Liberalism, and loses no opportunity for combating the popular superstitions of the Christianized world, for which the Freethinkers and truth seekers of the whole country can but be truly grateful; but Mrs. Freeman, as is the case with all of us, is liable to err, which, to my mind, is palpable in the article referred to.

The connecting link between Anarchy and Liberalism is yet to be forged. The intellect of enlightened people elevates the morals as well as the understanding, and it cannot be denied that no moral man will seek to justify Anarchism. Among the poorer classes of Russia, where men are compelled to minister to the tastes and comforts and luxuries and extravagances of those in power, for which not only no compensation is allowed, but the laborer is obliged to furnish his own living, there might be found a possible excuse for Anarchism, but in free America, where the right hand of fellowship is held out to all honest comers; the country that invites the down-trodden of other lands to make their homes with us; that offers to furnish the means of a better existence than most of them hav ever dreamed of; the land that has been the haven of refuge for the exile, and the source of rich competence for untold numbers; I say the fostering agent of Anarchy in such a land requires the utmost rigor for its suppression.

The principles of free speech in this country are sacred to the hearts of all true Americans. The justness of a man's cause must bear its own reward. When the dissatisfied, turbulent element of other countries flee to our shores, and seek to inflame the people to riotous conduct, it is an abuse of privilege that cannot be tolerated with safety. The laws of our country are potent enough to right the wrongs of a just cause, and when people ignore the law, and pursue barbaric methods, they forfeit all rights to protection, and invite governmental scrutiny and rigorous measures.

If the man who throws a bomb for the purpose of taking life escapes detection, can it be fairly argued that those who incited the immediate criminal to the act are innocent?

The idea that the laboring people are horrified at the sentence of the Chicago Anarchists is, I think, erroneous. The law-abiding citizen of this land, be he pauper or millionaire, be he a layman or a member of any or of all the labor societies of the country, will signify his approval of the maintenance of our laws by lending the full force of his influence to the side of law and order.

Liberalism must not be confounded with Anarchy. The enlightened people of the world will not, cannot, countenance the unlawful proceedings of bloodthirsty adventurers.

It has been my pleasure to support THE TRUTH SEEKER for the last ten years. I hav been well pleased in the main by its course, especially so with that which has advocated the taxing of church property. It cannot be expected that every individual will be entirely satisfied with all the articles of a newspaper, otherwise there would be no cause for argument and consequent diminution of literary matter. Myself, as well as others, can, at times, afford to swallow unsavory articles, but I feel inclined to protest against the defense of Anarchism in truth-seeking journals.

Missionaries in Persia.

Correspondence of the Galveston News.

Many people in America hav the idea that missionaries sent out by them into the spiritual wilderness of Persia and adjacent villages hav an awful hard time of it, that everybody here is working against them, and that they hav hardly enough to eat or a roof above their heads. You may tell such people that they are mistaken; that American missionaries in Persia hav a much easier time and more pleasant life of it than the vast majority of non-missionary folks in the United States. In fact, they are treated like princes here, like the salt of the earth. They live in fine, spacious houses, surrounded by verandas and gardens, and cool courtyards, in which the soldiers, the Persian government furnishes them with as guards hold forth; they hav enough to keep native servants and horses, and to eat the best meat and vegetables the land affords.

So far the labors of the missionaries hav laid mainly with the so-called Christian population, the Armenians, Nestorians, and Chaldeans being barred from meddling with the Moslem Persians proper by a religious law—still in force, though not always enforced—which decrees the painful and shameful death of any Islamite turned Christian, and the vigilance of both the authorities, and imams, and mullahs in this respect is truly remarkable. Considering that these missionary efforts hav been going on for fifty years, the number of converts to the Presbyterian form of Christianity is not alarmingly great, for the latest report gives but 1,796 communicants all over Persia. There are several thousand, however, belonging to the church, or animated with it. The Persian government does not directly interfere with the propaganda among its non-Moslem subjects, and hitherto a great deal of liberty has been enjoyed in the sale and distribution of the scriptures and other religious books, printed in Persian as well as Syriac and Armenian.

It is drunkenness especially which is the besetting sin of the Armenians, male and female. The manufacture and sale of wine and liquor is carried on in Persia exclusively by Armenians and Jews, who almost invariably grow rich at it. Indeed, it is held here the best paying business—that of selling drink. The Persians, being for the most part Shutes, are forbidden by the Koran to make or drink wine and spirits, and the small fraction of Sunnites in the north are just as strict in this respect.

"Free Schools."

The Roman Catholics are crafty as foxes. When they presented to the legislature of this state a bill asking that altars and other paraphernalia necessary to their worship might be provided in our penal institutions, they gave it the attractiv title of "Freedom of Worship" bill. THE TRUTH SEEKER had considerable to say about that bill, and will resume the subject if the bill should again appear before the New York legislature. Besides considering it as to its constitutionality, we pointed out that in face of the fact that the majority of our criminals are Roman Catholics, introducing Catholic worship into our prisons would be very much like carrying coals to Newcastle. Religion is already quite adequately represented there, and if worship were found to be desirable it would not in many cases be necessary to go outside the prison walls to find a priest or preacher to conduct the services. The majority of prison rolls include sufficient home talent in this capacity for all occasions that are likely to arise.

In a direct line with the "Freedom of Worship" bill is the Catholic demand for what the projectors are cunning enough to denominate "free schools;" free schools with a Romanist meaning schools where the teaching of Roman Catholicism is compulsory.

One of the most persistent clamorers for these schools is the Iowa Messenger, a Roman Catholic organ published at Davenport, Iowa. This paper denounces our public school system as "the common enemy of Christianity that is fast decimating the Christian ranks, and sowing seeds of Infidelity." Our present free school system, it adds, is "ruthlessly threatening the pillars of the Christian household," and "is throwing out a class of Atheists believing in no God, no law but their own ambitions, which are sufficiently large to desire the fruits of others' labor without any labor on their part." This last accusation comes with a poor show of consistency from the representativ of a class of priests who are notorious do-nothings, and who liv exclusivly upon the labor of others. As a matter of fact, it is the "spiritual-minded" everywhere who liv without work, and the worldly-minded support them.

But is it true that our common schools, with nearly every text-book reeking with pious twaddle, make Atheists of the children? And, if it is true, whose fault is it? If the modicum of secular knowledge which pupils acquire in our public schools overturns all the religious teachings of parents at home, teachers in the Sunday-classes, and priests in the churches, then those parents and teachers and priests must certainly hav very poor success in gaining the confidence of the children.

It is a lamentable truth that our public schools are not calculated to turn out minds free from religious bias. An examination of the text-books used will convince anyone that the contrary is the fact. Every text-book in common use, except, possibly, the arithmetic, contains allusions to God and religion; the New Testament is almost universally read, and many teachers open each day's exercises with prayer.

Our schools, then, can in no sense be said to be "Godless," and the Catholic shouters for "free" schools are aware of that fact, though, with a reckless disregard of truth, they seek to cover it up. Their real grievance is that the religious instruction now unlawfully afforded by our schools is not distinctivly Roman Catholic, but Protestant; and while this instruction is continued, and the compulsory school-law is in force, they hav real cause for complaint, as hav the Freethinkers and all other non-Protestants. Of course, no Catholic should be compelled by law to send his children to school and hav them taught what he regards as the Protestant heresy. Neither should a Freethinker's children be forced to receive religious teachings which they know to be false.

The way out of it is to keep religion out of public schools. If the Catholics desire the catechism taught along with secular instruction, let them proceed with their parochial schools, and support them by voluntary contributions. No one can deny them that right. The same course is open to Protestants. The Freethinker, having no special ax to grind, will be quite satisfied with a secular school. We hav no fear of the results of open competition between public schools and any which either Catholics or Protestants are likely to establish. Parents will not be slow to learn that something more than a knowledge of the catechism is necessary to a good education.

"The Truth Seeker" and the Anarchists.

Just previous to the ninth annual gathering of the New York Freethinkers we received the following:

"WELLAND, ONT., Aug. 13, 1886.

"MY FRIEND E. M. MACDONALD: I am not going to enter upon a discussion of the war that is now being carried on between labor and capital, though I hav my own views upon the subject, and do not think the affairs of the nation would be improved by conceding to the demands of the Anarchists or working classes. It is true that trade is dull and times are hard; many factories hav shut down, and large capital lies idle, because they cannot be run at a profit; and to be compelled to pay the same wages for less work would hav the effect of closing many more, which, instead of improving the condition of the working classes, would make it worse. If intelligence and capital are unable to direct the operations of trade profitably, it is, in my opinion, very doubtful that a class of people lacking both these requisits would be more successful.

"This is all I wish to say upon this subject. I notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER you appear to advocate the views of the Anarchists. Such may be your honest views, but in doing so you are losing the influence of THE TRUTH SEEKER for good, for upon this subject many intelligent and thinking readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER do not agree, and think you are to some extent losing sight of the object which THE TRUTH SEEKER had been intended to accomplish. I hav heard some of your best friends say that they did not like the course you were taking in the matter.

"My object in writing this is that you may think well whether you are not outside of your latitude.

"AUG. 28TH.—I wrote the above ten days ago, and had decided not to send it, but since reading 'The Trial of Anarchy in Chicago,' I hav decided to do so. You will at least see that all your readers do not indorse the same views. Hoping you may hav wisdom to edit THE TRUTH SEEKER in the best way to accomplish the most good, I am

"Sincerely your friend, JOHN RAY.

"P.S.—I am well aware that yours is a difficult task.

"J. R."

The writer of the foregoing is an aged friend whom we highly esteem for his many works of righteousness, as the Christians would say. But his mind seems to be a little clouded by the smoke of the war in Chicago, and we desire to talk to him a little.

With Mr. Ray's opinion of the struggle between capital and labor we find no fault. We are glad to see so great an economic question satisfactorily settled. But the statement that we seem to be advocating the views of the Anarchists we desire to dispute. It grieves us to think that those editorial columns of opposition to Anarchy which we printed last winter were wasted upon Mr. Ray. In them we distinctly combated the fundamental postulates of Anarchy, and pointed out, as we thought—and hundreds of readers hav assured us that we did—the untenableness of the position held by the Anarchist representativs. To us it seems that Anarchy is against all the experience of the human race, and about the most impracticable impracticability that a nest of brilliant impracticables ever astonished the world with. So much for the philosophy.

But since then a lot of so-called Anarchists hav been accused of conspiracy to murder. They hav been brought to trial, and sentenced to be hanged. Now, hanging is the penalty for only one crime—premeditated murder. The question is, then, not whether these men are Anarchists, or Socialists, or Infidels, or Christians, but, Are they guilty of premeditated murder? The evidence adduced by the prosecutors has not shown it. The man who threw the bomb at Chicago has not been found, and the connection of the condemned men with that wretch has in no wise been shown. Nevertheless, upon the testimony of an ex-convict, and in response to a popular clamor, started by a dishonest pulpit and increased by some unprincipled journalists, the jury find a verdict of guilty. THE TRUTH SEEKER protests against such a perversion of law and infraction of justice, and straightway we are accused of being Anarchists. If we did not know that our friend Ray has an unusually acute mind, we should be tempted to indicate our contempt for the reasoning faculties that cannot see the difference between advocating an opinion and advocating the right of a man to hold that opinion. Years ago a former editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER went to prison in defense of another's right to differ from him. The present editor has a vivid recollection of those times, and also remembers that he defended the action of D. M. Bennett. The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is neither an Anarchist, a Socialist, or a Communist, but he has a sincere respect for the many able men and women who hold those social views, and is not quite so arrogant in his own conceit as to say that there is no good in any of their philosophies. The present times are decidedly out of joint socially, and perhaps in one of these systems, or in all, lies the remedy for the labor troubles. Let us study them and see, instead of hanging their advocates.

Again, Mr. Ray says we shall lose the influence THE TRUTH SEEKER now has for good. Mr. Ray forgets that Freethinkers desire no influence but that which is gained by the reasonableness of their opinions. We should forfeit our own self-respect by pandering to a popular clamor, based on ignorance. An iniquity is none the less black because a majority howl for it; and if every other man, woman, and child in the United States demanded the hanging of every Socialist in the country, we should oppose it unless the Socialists had first been legally and justly convicted of some crime punishable by death; and even then we should rather make efforts for their reformation than see them executed.

Whether in this position we are outside of our latitude or not depends upon what lines of latitude bound Freethought. For one, we do not think that thought can be bounded. We know that there are a great many people who think that freedom means the right of themselvs to think and speak what they please, but not the right of their neighbors. Some Freethinkers limit Freethought to the right to criticise theology, but say that social institutions must be left alone. We cannot accept this definition. The Freethinker has been compared to the eagle beating the air with tireless wings, while the Christian is a caged bird piping his little song behind captiv bars. Is this but an insincere figure of speech, or is it the truth? We believe it to be the truth, and as applicable to those who criticise human institutions as to those who labor to remove alleged divine superstition from the world.

Freethought, as we understand it, stands for absolute freedom of thought, of speech, of publication, upon any and every subject upon earth. There is no such thing as a treasonable utterance in this country. Treasonable acts only can be cognized by the authorities placed in power by the people. If the traitor who threw the bomb that killed the policeman of Chicago could be found, we should advocate his punishment. Or if any of the condemned men had been shown to hav urged him to throw the bomb, then would their conviction be just. But the man has not been found and the connection has not been established. Therefore, we contend that the men are unjustly convicted. Perhaps no persons hav been more bitter opponents of Anarchy than J. L. Andrew, of Kansas, and E. A. Stevens, of Chicago. It was Mr. Stevens who thwarted the attempts of the Anarchists to capture the Liberal League of Chicago. Mr. Andrew has repeatedly shown in print the fallacy of Anarchistic philosophy. Yet Mr. Stevens is obliged to denounce the trial of the Anarchists as a farce, and Mr. Andrew, at the Freethinkers' Convention, said that the men were convicted in response to the same public clamor that nearly two thousand years ago rang through the streets of Jerusalem and ended in the crucifixion of Christ. Mr. Andrew added that the clergy had accused Infidelity of being the mother of Anarchy. If this were so, he said, he should advocate the suppression by law of Infidelity. But because he denounced as unfair the trial of the Anarchists, Mr. Andrew has since been accused by the press of teaching Anarchy. Mr. Andrew has our sympathy.

But, notwithstanding the liability to misrepresentation that one who stands up for the right incurs, we are not yet in that condition of mind which afflicts Mrs. Helen Wilmans, and which she describes to the editor of Foundation Principles in the following words:

"I am a coward, Lois. Ever since the result of the Anarchists' trial here I hav been boiling over with rage. Think of hanging men who hav no more been proved guilty of murder than I hav, and all because an idiotic people—the wretched tool of a monopolistic press—are crying for innocent blood! I hav been boiling with rage, but dare not say so in my paper. Yonder in the next room my forms are made up ready to go to press, and there is not one word of which my heart is so full. Am I afraid to speak my thoughts? Yes, I am. My paper would be condemned in the mails if I did, and I should run the risk of having my ribs stamped in by a ruffianly police that hav treated hundreds of people in this manner since the 4th of last May, when every soul in the city of Chicago was put under gag law under penalty of death."

We would not feel like that for four dollars. Far better would it be to fight the matter out. Neither do we care for the insinuation of a Western editor that we support Anarchy. We never did advocate Anarchy, and never shall till we experience a change of heart. However, this editor's insinuation counts little, for in his next paper he has to defend himself from the charge of being an Anarchist because he printed without specific condemnation one article from an Anarchist. This editor also has our heartfelt sympathy.

Suppose, for a moment, that we grant the right of the state to punish the advocacy of any opinions, where will it end? Who will say what opinions are to be suppressed? The majority, of course. Where then will Infidels be? Blasphemy laws are attempts to suppress freedom of speech. But what Freethinker is there who will not resist the enforcement of these laws? And is freedom only for Freethinkers? for theological heretics and not for social heretics? It would be very unsafe, we think, to allow that the majority hav any right to control the expression of opinion of the minority. If the principle should be once allowed, every Freethinker would shortly be in the predicament of our friend Reynolds—under arrest for expressing sentiments repugnant to the beliefs of the majority. Seeing the inevitable outcome of such laws, Freethinkers must avoid the consequences by denying the principle upon which such laws as those against blasphemy rest. To be consistent we must maintain the rights of our enemies as jealously as we defend our own. And that is all that THE TRUTH SEEKER has done in condemning the sentence of the Anarchists.

Editorial Notes.

SOMEBODY has suggested that the fortunes accumulated by ministers and priests should, upon the death of the owners, be devoted to the establishment of asylums for idiots. In this way, it is believed, the money would get back to those from whom it originally came.

RECENTLY the Evening Post included among "selections from scripture" the first verse of Psalm xc, "God, thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations," and the Observer calls it a "most ludicrous mistake," saying, "This passage is not in the Old or New Testament." Like most Christians, the Observer editor is unfamiliar with scripture.

A MONTREAL correspondent of John Swinton's Paper says that in that city Cardinal Taschereau's order against the Knights of Labor has not had the effect intended, and that the order is growing faster than ever. This independence of the church is a healthy sign. Perhaps the pope has not got all the French Canadians under his thumb, though it would be hazardous to stake much upon it.

SEWARD MITCHELL, of Newport, Maine, has issued another number of his World's Reformer. There are but very few questions upon which the average man or woman can agree with Mr. Mitchell, but his very difference from all the other people in the world makes his paper good reading. Life would be tiresome if everyone thought and acted and looked just like everybody else. Ten cents will procure a copy of the World's Reformer, and it is worth the money.

WHEN New Jersey entered the Union the following law was upon her statute-books: "All women, of whatever age, rank, profession, or degree, whether virgins, maids, or widows, who shall after this act impose upon, seduce, and betray into matrimony any of his majesty's subjects by virtue of scents, cosmetics, washes, paints, artificial teeth, false hair, or high-heeled shoes, shall incur the penalty of the law now in force against witchcraft and like misdemeanors." New Jersey ought to again enact this law and put it alongside of the law which makes denying the providence of "God" a crime. The two laws are identical in spirit.

IT is amazing what stupidity sits enthroned in religious editorial chairs! Writing of the recent earthquake in Charleston, the Presbyterian Observer says: "However prompt and definit science may be with its explanations, the rumblings of the dreaded and dreadful earthquake are most certainly echoes of the tones of the most high." The Baptist Weekly in its earthquake editorial thinks "it is useless and presumptuous for finite minds to attempt to say why God permits calamities" like this one "to occur." The Freeman's Journal, Catholic, asserts that "these chastisements are mercies, intended to waken up men to the vanity and briefness of life." With men like these directing the thought of the people, what wonder that the world is full of superstition?

HELEN GARDENER tells a nice little story for the amusement of her Christian acquaintances. One of her friends happened to be at an Indian mission, and, among other inquiries into the condition of the Indians, asked whether many of them were converted. "Oh, yes, a great many," said the preacher in charge. "Come around at the hour for distributing Testaments, and see for yourself." The lady found it convenient to make several calls on these occasions. At her last visit an Indian came who she thought had already been presented with a Testament. "Havn't you got a Testament?" she asked. "Ugh!" replied the brave, "Indian need lot Testament. Indian damn lonesome." The graceless aborigine had been getting Testaments and trading them off for things to render his lone condition less irksome. Miss Gardener's friend's interest in the Christianizing of the Indians was satisfied.

W. E. SOOTT, one of the activ labor agitators of this city concludes an address to the laboring men with these chunks of truth: "Politics and religion are two subjects that hav always been excluded from labor organizations, under a false notion that they hav nothing to do with the object of a trade union, and that politics and religion are foreign to it. The labor organizations see things in a different light now, and hav gone so far as to put up a few candidates of their own. On the political road, which is the only one by which they will ever reach the goal they are striving to obtain, they will meet with that formidable barrier to their progress—church and religion. Religion will never sanction anything that wage-workers undertake to do when they see it will better their condition. The pope of Rome condemned the Irish Land League, and lately an edict was issued from the same place against the Knights of Labor for being just what the Roman church is itself—a secret order. They know that the Land League of Ireland and the Knights of Labor are two organizations whose sole object is to better the condition of the poor, and anyone with a streak of common sense in him can see that everything in the interest of the wage-worker will always be contrary to the church."

AMONG those who attended the recent New York State Freethinkers' Convention was C. F. DeMott, of Hempstead, L. I. Mr. DeMott is a photographer, and he brought along his camera. The result is found in our advertising columns, wherein Mr. DeMott sets forth that he "took" the Convention in three positions. Position number one discloses thirty-six heretics, including a Hindoo, as follows: J. V. Arnold and his nephew, Mrs. Wilbur, Mrs. Gault, Sadie Thorpe, Mrs. Reynolds, Prof. G. G. Grower, analytical chemist; E. M. Macdonald, L. K. Washburn, C. B. Reynolds, Mr. McAlpine, J. L. Andrew, S. W. Devenbaugh, Mr. and Mrs. Booth, C. P. Somerby, Miss Marie Burnier, Mr. and Mrs. Gardiner, T. B. Wakeman, T. L. Brown, F. Burnier, Hattie Thorpe, Mrs. and Miss DeMott, Gopal Vinayak Joshee, Lucy N. Colman, Miss Ida Le Compte, C. M. Powers, Mr. Evans, Mr. Bissell, Mr. Wilcox, Mr. Thorpe, his wife and son, and a stranger who wouldn't pay ten cents to go into the tent and who only had his picture taken because it was free. Every one of these individuals, except the stranger, will, of course, send fifty cents for a copy of this picture. Position number two is a view of the grounds, tents, and lake, with no individuals in sight to mar the landscape. Mr. DeMott must hav arisen very early to obtain this desirable negativ. Position number three is a close view of the tents with a few persons in front. The rest of the Convention was inside the large tent listening to Dr. Brown. Mr. DeMott asserts that every Freethinker will desire to possess these pictures, and he generously offers to send them all for one dollar.

So bitter is the opposition just now against social reformers that we almost fear to recommend to our readers the new edition of "Rational Communism" just issued by the Truth Seeker Company. If we venture to write a few words in praise of the scholarly qualities of the work, someone will say—notwithstanding the contrary declaration elsewhere—that the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER has turned Communist. But if we quote only the recommendations of others, such, for instance, as the well-known conservativ, W. S. Bell, who says the book "exposes the barbarism of civilized society, and points out methods of escape from it," we trust we may, without exciting public prejudice and losing several valued subscribers, be allowed to say that a paper-covered edition is now on the market at the ridiculously low price, for a book of 498 pages, of fifty cents per copy, and one dollar in cloth. The book, as we hav before explained, is a concise statement of the wrongs under which poor people now labor, an indignant protest against the perpetuation of these wrongs, and an endeavor to show how, by adopting a rational system of Communism, society can be so reorganized that there shall be no extremely rich nor extremely poor. Everybody, according to our author, will, in such a community, hav enough to eat, enough to wear, enough recreation and pleasure, and enough work to earn all these, which shall then come as a matter of justice between man and man, and not as a result of sharp practice, lucky speculation, or excessiv toil. Whether the author is right or not is not for us to say, but for each to determin for himself. These is no question but that the author's statements of the societary evils of to-day are correct, and there is also no question that such a state of affairs is a burning shame in a civilized community. The only open subject for discussion is whether our social doctor has prescribed the correct remedy. Those interested in these matters can find that out by reading the book.

THE Rev. Mr. Lauer, of Cleveland, Ohio, seems to be a second L. K. Washburn. Recently at a watering-place he preached a sermon upon "The Church of the Future," and his appearance is thus described by a correspondent of the Pittsburgh Dispatch: "He is young, good-looking, scholarly, and nothing about either himself or his sermon indicated shabbiness, seediness, or any of the characteristics of a crank evangelist. He did not wear his hair behind his ears, nor did he hav the look of far-awayness suggestiv of a screw loose in his brain. He was evidently a sober, sensible young man, full of energy, enthusiasm, and ambition." The sermon he preached was an exposition of the "new theology," as far away from the old doctrins and creeds as anything can possibly be. The foundation of this "theology" is evolution. It holds that man, instead of being created perfect in the garden of Eden and degenerating by reason of original sin, had, on the contrary, risen from a germ or protoplasm, and was in the nature of things growing more and more toward perfection; that mankind, instead of being predestined in the majority to endless punishment, was rather growing more and more up to the highest ideals. It rejects nothing that can be sustained by science. It holds as truth the brotherhood of man. It holds as false and cruel the doctrin of election and total depravity. It entirely abjures the notion "that in Adam's fall we sinned all." It would break down the barriers of sects, and claims as brother every man who desires to liv a pure, true, and righteous life. The people of Cleveland are to be congratulated upon their good fortune in securing such a preacher.

IN arranging for intellectual treats for the Freethinkers of this state who did not attend the recent Convention, Mr. C. B. Reynolds sent the following letter to the preachers:

"33 CLINTON PLACE, NEW YORK, Aug. 16, 1886.

"DEAR SIR: The New York Freethinkers' Association will hold its annual Convention at White Sulphur Springs, on Saratoga Lake, N. Y., September 2 to 12, 1886. Hundreds of persons who are now in 'Doubting Castle' will be influenced to decide for Secularism or Christianity at this meeting. The first principle of Secularists is justice; our motto, 'Seek your own happiness by promoting that of others.' We desire therefore that all honest hearts be afforded opportunity to learn all the facts—that error may be refuted and all be enabled to decide intelligently. Knowing your great reverence for the Bible, we respect your consistent course in urging all to obey and reverence its teachings. 'But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts, and be ready always to giv an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear' (1 Peter iii, 15). We, therefore, feel confident you will promptly respond to our invitation to giv the reason of your faith and hope. We cordially invite you to attend on the days most convenient to yourself, and discuss the claims the Bible has upon the people as a guide of life, and the effect upon the civilized world of the religion known as Christianity. We pledge you the most kind and courteous treatment. Your opponent shall be of highest moral character, a scholar, and in every respect a gentleman, whose sole desire is to hav the truth triumphant. Please forward the proposition you desire to affirm, and make your own selection of dates between September 2d and 12th for the discussion, and the Executiv Committee will arrange their program to suit your convenience. Awaiting your reply,

"With respects and kindly wishes,

"Yours truly, C. B. REYNOLDS,

"Acting Chairman of Ex. Com. N. Y. F. A."

Of all these not one accepted. A few sent letters of regret that they could not attend, others put their negativ replies in their local papers, and the balance kept very quiet. It seems astonishing that among so many men earning a living by preaching none could be found with sufficient courage to face the Freethinkers.

Letters from Friends.

VINELAND, N. J., Sept. 10, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send you $2, and request you to pay $1 to friend Reynolds, to aid him in his fight with the saints of Boonton, and the other dollar accept to aid in THE TRUTH SEEKER illustrations.

If THE TRUTH SEEKER could afford to hav an artist when Friend Reynolds's trial comes off at Morris county, and at Monmouth county when the Hindoo is tried, perhaps you might discover the missing link. J. S. SHEPARD.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., Aug. 26, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find money order for five dollars—three for renewal for one year, and two for C. B. Reynolds to aid the cause of Freethought at the Convention.

The two books came as per order. I take pride in circulating all such productions among my Christian friends. I wish Brother John Peck would reconstruct and enlarge on his late article in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hav it published in pamphlet form. The subject is a good one, and material is sufficiently abundant to insure good results.

R. BUTTERFIELD.

ST. PAUL, MINN., Sept. 7, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5, to apply on the picture fund. Mr. Heston is doing splendidly, and I sincerely hope he may be spared many years in the exercise of his artistic skill in showing up the inconsistency of the Bible and the pernicious influence of Catholicism. I hav gained much information from the illustrations myself, in that they hav made clear to me subjects that before were obscure. I consider the pictures not only essential for the conversion of Christians, but also of incalculable value to the uneducated and indifferent Liberals. J. C. ROE.

GYMPIE, QUEENSLAND, Aug. 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Dr. J. L. York, the Californian Freethought lecturer, has now finished a series of eight lectures to fairly representativ audiences. Notwithstanding the weather was rather inclement for the greater part of the three weeks that the doctor has been with us, it is noteworthy that the attendance at the lectures formed the more advanced, liberal, and intelligent portion of our town and district, and judging from the manner in which Dr. York's scathing criticisms of the superstitions and bigotry of the various sections of the Christian churches were received, the audiences were thoroughly with the lecturer.

The Protestant ministers associated and invited a Mr. H. A. Long from Glasgow Green, an anti-Infidel orator, who was lecturing in Brisbane, to come here for the purpose of counteracting Dr. York's influence with the people. Mr. Long is evidently a mere puppet as compared with our American friend, the whole of his logic being a mere play upon words, and twaddle of the most childish description, whilst the oratory of the doctor is most irresistible in its logical reasonings and appeals to the common sense of the people. The more Dr. York has spoken here, the greater influence he has obtained.

Last night was his farewell lecture here, and at the suggestion of some friends a Freethought Union was formed in the room, forty-seven members joining. The following officers were elected: Mr. W. H. Walker, president; Messrs. Lewis and Robinson, vice-presidents; Mr. C. Glegg, treasurer; Mr. R. H. Datson, honorable secretary. I hav no doubt that this branch will grow and flourish, as the platform is sound and liberal, and the people are anxious for the truth. The circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER will also be extended here. Dr. York leaves here to-day for Maryborough, where he will giv a course of lectures prior to again returning to the metropolis. R. H. DATSON.

LONG LAKE, MINN., Aug. 30, 286.

MR. EDITOR: I need not say I like THE TRUTH SEEKER, for I hav taken it ever since the first issue, and will continue to take it until I "shuffle off this mortal coil," which (to me) momentous event cannot be much longer deferred, as this is my seventy-sixth year. But, like the man about the horse trade, I will leave word with my boys to take it. Two of them, who liv one hundred miles from me, take it now.

Thirty-one years ago, I came with my family from Nova Scotia to Minnesota. My two oldest boys, aged sixteen and eighteen, enlisted and served through our war. My wife passed to spirit life twenty years ago. About that time I learned that Spiritualism was true; that the great question of the ages, "If a man die, shall he liv again?" was solved. Yes, if I may trust the evidence of my senses, my nearest and dearest relativs and friends hav come to me again and again.

This to me is not belief merely, but knowledge. It is granted that frauds, impostors, and parasites hang like an incubus on the skirts of our philosophy; but suppose one-half the phenomena falsely called Spiritual is fraudulently produced, that does not disprove what is genuin. Nay, one fact in a thousand, demonstrated beyond a shadow of doubt, will stand against volumes of sophistry and ridicule. Spiritualism is growing fast enough. The world is not ready for it yet. It is like casting pearls before—well, before some people who do not know their value—to talk to them on that most interesting of all subjects. When I read such letters as we sometimes hav from Messrs. Winter and Northup, I am almost a convert to Mr. Beecher's latest departure, that a large minority of our race are at death stricken out of being, and possibly where there is no desire for a continued life or a knowledge of spiritual things, persons so constituted are not worth saving.

Some people think that the power to reason exists only in the human brain. Our brain is well adapted to this condition of being, but does it follow that a more etherealized brain more powerful to think and reason does not exist? We learn something of the almost endless forms of life on this planet, but who knows what forms life may assume on other worlds? We can produce all the tones and semitones employed in music. Does it follow that there are no other sounds in the universe than we can create? We can make all the colors and shades of color conceivable. Does it follow that no other colors exist?

I don't offer argument, but many of your readers are well qualified to teach our philosophy, and those who wish to get knowledge must reach for it. The Materialists hav been getting ahead of us as regards volume, not argument, for some time past in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hope to hear from some of our able writers soon.

Mr. Heston's pictures are excellent. He is a philosopher as well as an artist. W. ARCHIBALD.

OAKLAND, CAL., Aug. 26, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: At this stage of the world's progress, it seems rather strange, and givs me a sense of being set back a century, to learn through your paper that our friend and brother in the cause of humanity was mobbed, arrested, and otherwise maltreated for violating a law I fear was made more to protect a worthless, idle class than to benefit an almighty who can take care of himself.

If we punish Mr. Reynolds, I fear we shall punish ourselvs also. Are the American people to wade through the church-made rivers of blood that our fathers crossed only a few years ago? Will the American workingman pay a church for teaching old fables that degrade and brutalize his children? What is more degrading than the doctrin that a man should eat his God? And yet we Catholics must do that. I could see with my God-made eyes the consecrated wafer; I could taste, and my reason, God's highest and most sacred gift to me, declared, "'Tis a wafer and nothing more." The ox can follow his God-given instinct, but man must obey the church, and must lower himself beneath the ox. He must subscribe to a doctrin which God himself tells him, through nature, is not only false, but barbarous.

It is not to be wondered at that Christians are themselvs cruel to one another and to their neighbors, when their God planned from the beginning that monstrous fable, the agony on the cross. Oh, what pain comes over my heart to see that dreadful symbol of ignorance and superstition and cruelty, that dreadful cross! Mr. Reynolds, beware of the cross? Remember Bruno, and don't forget our persecuted Thomas Paine.

I will end by commencing with $1 to help pay for your defense, and hope that all lovers of truth and free speech will do the same. Yours truly, THOMAS ARPER.

SMITH'S MILL, MINN., Sept. 5, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: It was not my intention to intrude so soon again, but the temptation to acquaint you with the success of our Liberal meetings is irresistible. There were three of them, occurring Saturday evening, August 28th, Sunday afternoon and evening, August 29. Saturday evening's meeting was held under difficulties, a day of drizzling rain having degenerated into a night of intense darkness. Notwithstanding, Mr. Remsburg was greeted by a fair audience. His lecture on Thomas Paine was a revelation to some of his hearers, and had the effect to drive one good father in Israel from the house.

Sunday morning dawned in sorrowful protest against our contemplated wickedness, but sunshine under certain circumstances is a part of nature's inflexible law, orthodoxy to the contrary notwithstanding. So out amid waving trees and dancing sunbeams, after partaking of something better than miraculously evoluted "loaves and fishes," we were treated to an intellectual feast, on the subject of "Sabbath Breaking." The audience, though small, owing to the previous unfavorable condition of the weather, was thoroughly appreciativ, as was shown both by their attention and willingness to lend a hand financially. The inspiring strains of a brass band gave life and zest to the occasion, and altogether the meeting was a success of which our Liberals may justly be proud. Fortune favored us with perfect conditions on Sunday evening, and our speaker stood in the presence of such an audience as Jamesville seldom sees. The churches were closed, and orthodoxy lent a reluctant, though curious, ear. I venture to say "False Claims" were never received by an audience of greater diversity of opinion. All shades of thought were represented, and judging from the emphatic and continued applause with which some of his most sweeping denunciations of the church were received, the citizens of our vincinity must hav fallen from grace, or the new philosophy, with its broader humanity and infinitly more enobling attributes, has fired their slumbering minds with its irresistible magnetism. Liberals should be proud of Mr. Remsburg; he goes forth clad in the impenetrable armor of science, truth, and reason, to battle against the death-grip of superstition, ignorance, and fear.

IRWIN, IOWA, Sept. 6, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Critically examining the picture, "Casting Pearls Before Swine," I came to the conclusion, while looking at the guide-post which directs the wayfarer "To Boonton," that the swine idea is a mistake. Boonton is, I make it, an abbreviation of Baboon-town. There is this tendency to shorten words observable among all people. We hav here in Iowa the Coon river, and everyone knows this is short for Raccoon. The opossum is now called by almost everyone simply the possum. So in this word Baboon-town both ends hav been cut down, just as its natives say "tate" or "tater" for potato, and I hasten to set its etymology in a proper light. This derivation of the word is so obvious that I hav not thought it necessary to consult authorities. As Prairie-du-Chien is named from its former inhabitants, so is Baboonton called so to show the character of its present population. This curious town, with its half-evoluted breed, is an excellent argument for the Darwinian theory. It furnishes the long-sought "missing link." As there is a transitional period in the metamorphoses of the batrachia when it can be pronounced neither tadpole nor frog, so it is difficult to call these either human or brute. Dean Swift would probably call them Yahoos; but let us call them as they are, baboons, and let us compassionate them with a sort of fellow feeling, for where they are now our ancestors were several million years ago. It is related that one of these creatures, several years ago, by some chance found itself in France and in the presence of Dumas fils, on which occasion it evinced a curiosity greatly to be wondered at in a creature of such low parts. It interrogated this celebrated Frenchman of African descent as to his ancestry.

"What countryman was your father, sir?"

"He was a Frenchman, sir."

"And your grandfather?"

"A Frenchman."

"And your great-grandfather?"

This, from a Yahoo, was too much for even our imperturbable Frenchman. A cloud shadows his brow and lightning flashes from his eye as he thunders at the impertinent brute:

"He was an ape, sir! My pedigree began where yours ends!"

Just so we may seek to abate the disagreeable characteristics of these creatures; but we should remember what has been may yet be, and from this humble stock may yet spring true men. However, till there be some encouraging sign, as a warning to strangers, let us restore the original orthography of this name and write it on our maps "Baboonton." As the case stands now, who could blame a "decent-like hog" for getting enraged at being pictured in such beastly quarters, or at being identified with the "Baboons of Baboonton," N. J.? J. K. P. BAKER.

LIBERAL LITERATURE.

UNION STAR, KY., Sept. 11, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: In no way can the cause of Freethought be more benefited and advanced than by the free, liberal, and indiscriminate scattering of Freethought literature.

There are thousands of persons in this country who hav grave and honest doubts in regard to the infallibility, honesty, and truthfulness of the teachings of Christianity, though they hav never read a page of Liberal literature, hav never seen a Freethought journal, pamphlet, tract, or leaflet, and probably do not even know there are such publications in existence.

Such persons doubt, but cannot tell why they doubt. They do not believe the Christian doctrin, but do not know what else to believe. They drift about aimlessly in this chaos of doubt and uncertainty, it may be for many years, unable to collect their scattered, skeptical thoughts, or center them on anything tangible. Being surrounded by churches, Christians, Bibles, and all kinds of religious (superstitious) literature, after sermon upon sermon has spent itself upon their heads, revival after revival has thundered about their ears, they at last—reasoning that "if there is no good in it there can, at least, be no harm; if we are right in our doubts we will be none the worse off, and if we are wrong we may save our souls from eternal punishment"—generally succumb, join some religious society, and by so doing assist in the propagation of ignorance and superstition, when, probably, if a single copy of some Liberal journal, tract, or pamphlet, containing a catalog of other Freethought works, had fallen into their hands, 'twould hav been manna to their doubting souls. It retained them and their influence in the cause of liberty and enlightenment.

This being the truth, every Freethinker in the land should take it upon himself or herself to distribute and circulate just as much Freethought literature as it is in his or her power to do. It is a fact that there are a great many Liberals that are not pecuniarily so fortunate as to be able to do a great deal. For many of us it is about all that we can do to keep the wolf of want from our doors, still we can add our mite, and every little helps. Too many of us are in the habit of not doing anything for the cause that should be next our hearts. We hav had the clouds of superstition rolled back, our mental sky shines forth thickly studded with the brilliants of truth and science, and we move along in the even tenor of our way, basking in the sunshine of happiness, never once mindful of the thousands of poor souls that are continually trembling with superstitious fear, and giving their hard-earned dollars to a set of sleek, lazy, good-for-nothing vagabonds to atone for some imaginary sin they hav committed against some imaginary being, in some imaginary world; never once, mindful of the thousands of little children—natural Freethinkers—that are having their innocent minds pressed and molded in the strait-jackets of religious creeds.

It is high time that Freethinkers were awaking to a sense of their duty. Let us up and be doing. Let us reach out our hands to our fellow-being and help lift him out of the slough in which he has so long been plodding.

There hav been many schemes set forth in the columns of our Liberal papers, by their able contributors, for the more general distribution of Liberal literature, all of which we all approve but never act upon. And now, kind friends, your humble servant, the undersigned, has a plan of distribution which he wishes to submit for your consideration, and it is hoped that it will not only be approved, but liberally acted upon.

We are all of us subscribers, or ought to be, to one or more Liberal papers, and are continually buying pamphlets, tracts, etc. These we read and then generally throw them upon our book shelves, or in our desks, and right there their mission ends, their circulation stops. This is not doing either our cause or our publications justice. They should be kept in circulation, and my plan of distribution is this: Let us set apart a certain day—say, the first day of each month—to gather up our old papers, tracts, etc., and mail them severally to other persons. We can obtain names from newspapers, circulars, school and college catalogs, etc., or we can exchange a list of names with each other. It might be asked, Why exchange your lists of names? For this reason: Most every Liberal, in his own community, is a "notorious Infidel," and any reading matter that he would hand an orthodox Christian would be immediately consigned to the flames, with the accompanying prayer that its donor might meet with a like fate hereafter, though, if the same thing should be received through the mails, it would be read, and probably some good accomplished.

Now, brothers and sisters, let us act upon this suggestion. On the first day of every month let us start some Liberal reading matter out on missionary work, if it is only a single package. What a pleasure it will be to know that, while we are folding, wrapping, and superscribing the dear old TRUTH SEEKERS and Investigators, and starting them out on their mission of love, enlightenment, liberty, and reform, there are probably thousands of others occupied in the same pleasant manner!

Let us begin this good work the first day of October, and so load the United States mails with Infidelity on that day that the great Jewish Jehovah will be so enraged he will feel like wrecking every steamboat and railroad train on the continent. I, for one, will pledge myself to make a general clean cut on that day, and start at least fifty packages. If 999 other persons will do the same thing, there will be fifty thousand persons receive reading matter of a kind that probably they hav never seen before. Just think of it! Fifty thousand strangers reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, and other Liberal journals, periodicals, tracts, pamphlets, leaflets, etc., the first few days of October! Could the result be anything but good? CLAYTON CROSSON.

BROOKLYN, E. D., N. Y., Sept. 2, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Some Freethinkers would be startled at the idea that a live Spiritualist should hav the folly to attempt to ventilate his ideas through your columns, but when such thinkers understand you hav hundreds of these demented subscribers on your list, they will cease to wonder.

In speaking of mediums and mediumship, I think there is much misconception. Many suppose that the circumstance of a person, man, woman, or child, being a medium implies that such individual is of superior intellect, superior morality, superior learning, and superior wisdom, when in fact the reverse is too often most sorrowfully the truth. Thus, although we hav met, in our long experience, many estimable mediums of all phases of enlightenment—mediums who hav stood and still stand high in the estimation of the public—yet we regret to affirm that we hav among us creatures who are equally as good mediums, but of the most degraded type, without the slightest conception of virtue or morality. This is well to be early understood. About this time much is said about Mr. Truesdell's teachings. Now, whether he is a fraud or medium, or both, is a matter of question.

It is a known fact among Spiritualists that there are many mediums sailing around among the public "so loose of soul" who sell the phenomena of Spiritualism for greed—that is, where there is a community of skeptics they serve it up as a mere trick, and so it passes; but when they strike a community of believers, they pass off the phenomena as genuin. These creatures select the name of some reputable medium, slate-writer, rapping or clairvoyant, as the case may be, and when detected, bring down disgrace both on their own head and that of the assumed honest medium. All they go for is the almighty dollar.

Mediumship, in all its strangeness, is far from being a lucrativ business, and mediums, like all our advanced thinkers and lecturers, hav to eat off very small plates to make a living, and I hav yet to learn of the first genuin medium who has laid by a competency for old age. It is true such mediums may write an interesting book, and expect much from its sale; but people are beginning to discriminate between fact, fraud, and fiction, and there is too much private or domestic examination of this mystic subject to question its truth.

The writer, perhaps, was the first one who tried the invisibles in their ability to giv the word that would open the common Bramah lock, with its three or four million changes. He once flattered himself it was an impossibility, but was mistaken, let the lock be set as remote from the medium as was chosen, or by whom. This experiment took place fully twenty-five or thirty years ago.

While in at the rooms of a medium one day a stranger entered. He addressed the medium, saying, "I hav recently heard much of late on the mystery of lock-opening; now, here is one that has been closed for five years past. It belonged to my brother, who has been dead that space of time. Now, if the combination cannot be given, it must remain closed and useless.

The medium and myself gave the lock an inspection. It was really a costly and beautiful lock, of silver, and artistically made. The lock was laid on the table before the medium, and his hand involuntarily wrote the word "Mohawk." The gentleman seized the lock, and, on trial of its six rings with trembling hands, it readily opened to the word.

The gentleman mused in silence for a few minutes, and at length said that, by computation, this lock, with its six rings inscribed with the Roman alphabet of twenty-six letters, would giv changes of many, many millions, to open it by mere guessing! If the skeptic should choose mind-reading as a last resort, the only mind conceivable would be the mind of the defunct brother. The writer has in store, through his experience, hundreds of facts, but to conclude that he had, arrived at the bottom facts of the mysteries of existence he does not presume, although he has a very vivid recollection of some of its rascalities and frauds. D. BRUCE.

MILWAUKEE, OR., Sept. 15, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Evolution is a fact, but the manner in which it takes place is to some extent theory. The value of a lecture like that recently published in THE TRUTH SEEKER by Mr. Watts is that it helps us to understand that process. Those who hav access to books and museums, and leisure to study, should be careful to giv us accurate statements of the results of scientific inquiry.

Mr. Watts speaks of "spontaneous generation" as a part of the process of evolution, whereas, if it were true, it would disprove evolution. He says: "Dr. Bastian maintains that he has succeeded, in innumerable instances, in producing live organisms from non-living matter. Hence the doctrin of evolution, which is in accordance with true philosophy, finds support in that physical science where we should expect to meet with it, and to which it really belongs."

If innumerable organisms, some higher, some lower, belonging to different species, can be produced spontaneously, evolution is superseded. The independent slate-writer fastens two slates together so nothing can possibly be written between them, and then produces the slates with writing on them, and says it was done by spirits. M. Pouchet manufactures "artificial water" out of oxygen and hydrogen, subjects it to heat above the boiling point, isolates it from the whole world, from all the past of our planet's history, in fact, makes a little artificial world of his own, and in that world makes the conditions for the production of life the most favorable possible. He then shows it to you containing animals vastly higher than many which are known to hav been evolved from lower forms, and says they came there themselvs. If this is true, what may we not assume to hav occurred where the conditions were favorable? If so much can be done in such a little world, made out of artificial water, surely this great world, with its immense variety of chemical and thermal conditions, its vast oceans and continents, should be expected to produce spontaneously the higher animals and man. Instead of saying, with Reade, "Dots of animated jelly, without definit form or figure, swimming unconsciously in the primeval sea, were the ancestors of man, and the history of our race begins with them, and continues without an interruption to the present day," we may say of our maternal ancestor, in the language of the poet:

> Hopsy Popsy never was born;
> She never had a mother.
> She must hav hatched out in the corn
> Or haystack, one or t'other.

The notion of spontaneous generation contradicts the plainest facts of embryology. Francis E. White, M.D. (Popular Science Monthly, March, 1884), says: "In the earliest perceptible stage of its existence, the human being consists of a minute, apparently homogeneous mass of living matter, of a kind known, since the days of Von Mohl and Remak, as protoplasm." But protoplasm is itself the result of evolution, and its production implies time and conditions which could not possibly be obtained in a little isolated world made out of artificial water.

Another point needs a little criticism. Mr. Watts says: "Man was certainly the last animal that appeared, as he was the highest. If it be asked, Why highest as well as last? the answer is that because, by the process of evolution, the highest must be last."

Why should all the animals stop evoluting the instant a being distinctivly human appeared? Is it not inevitable that the same forces and conditions which had produced thousands of species before should continue to operate? How could we know if such a sentiment were true? Listen to Professor Huxley: "It is not by any means certain that man—I mean the species homo sapiens of zoological terminology—has consummated the land population in the sense of appearing at a later period than any other. Let me make my meaning clear by an example. From a morphological point of view, our beautiful and useful contemporary—I might call him colleague—the horse (equus caballus), is the last term of the evolutional series to which he belongs, just as homo sapiens is the last term of the evolutional series of which he is a member. If I want to know whether the species equus caballus made its appearance on the surface of the earth before or after homo sapiens, deduction from known law does not help me. There is no reason that I know of why one should hav appeared sooner or later than the other. If I turn to observation, I find abundant remains of equus caballus in Quaternary strata, perhaps a little earlier. The existence of homo sapiens in the Quaternary epoch is also certain. Evidence has been produced in favor of man's existence in the Pliocene or even in the Miocene epoch. It does not satisfy me; but I hav no reason to doubt that the fact may be so, nevertheless. Indeed, I think it quite possible that further research will show that homo sapiens existed not only before equus caballus but before many other existing forms of animal life" (The Interpreters of Genesis and the Interpreters of Nature). Is not man as likely to be the oldest as the youngest of the present mammalian inhabitants of our planet?

D. PRIESTLEY.

DECATUR, ILL., Sept. 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The Christian says that God will protect him in time of disease and battle, and also that he will answer his prayers. Now, I will not only ask the layman, but also the clergy, to come and let us reason together, that by our commingling ideas we may both be profited. Now, when the Christian is stricken low with disease he never once dreams of the efficacy of prayer, but hastily resorts to the skill of medicin, which is not the invention of God but of man. And while in this moment of peril his faith in God as a healing medium vanishes like the hoary frost before the dawning sun. And should the patient recover under the treatment of the physician, the clergy will assume the authority for saying "the Lord is not willing that he should pass from among us yet." But should the physician not understand the disease of his patient, and he dies, the clergyman in attendance at the funeral will again assume the authority for saying, "Brothers and sisters, the Lord has seen fit, in his tender mercy, to take this brother from our midst that he might be relieved of his suffering"—speaking as though (taking the Christian at his own idea of God's power) God could not just as easily relieve the suffering by healing them as to kill and rob them of their lives.

Now, taking the Christian at his own claim, that God inspires or dictates to the physician how to administer his medicin to the afflicted in order to heal or kill them, what then would be the need of men to concern themselvs to acquire a knowledge of what is required to get a diploma? If God does administer aid to suffering humanity through the efforts of man, why can he not dispense with man entirely? If God is ever-present, and in attendance with the physician at the bed of affliction, why has it not always been just as easy to cure a case of small-pox as one of chicken-pox? Does the fatality of a disease depend upon God's assistance? If so, is not his attribute of a contagious order? In what way does he commingle his infinit attributes with any disease in order to heal or kill the ailing?

These are questions that certainly can be answered by the Christian sa he would not believe in something of which he could giv no conception. Again, it is erroneously claimed that there is a God of battles. This silly notion, however, is not confined to the Christian world, but is harbored in the minds of every barbaric tribe on the face of the earth—the combatants on each side claiming that God in some mysterious way is particularly interested in the extermination of those they are pleased to call their enemies. Of course they admit that battles are fought by men, but they are credulous about the matter to the effect that God is the real cause of the victory. But how this miraculous achievement is obtained they offer no information that would satisfy a rational mind—that relies upon ocular demonstrations—but they comfort themselvs in this way rather than disturb their dead calm of faith to learn the startling facts that an abundance of ammunition, disciplined soldiers, and good generalship are required to win battles. To deny the assistance of God's hand in time of battle is simply sacrilegious in the sight of an adherent to this delusion; though we should not expect anything better of the Jew or Christian when they hav from time immemorial been infused with the following Bible passages which they consider as having emanated direct from God: "The Lord is a man of war; the Lord is his name." "The Lord shall go forth as a mighty man; he shall stir up jealousy like a man of war; he shall cry, Yea, war! he shall prevail against his enemies." "The Lord hath opened his armory, and hath brought forth the weapons of his indignation." "And he said unto them, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Put every man his sword by his side, and go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion; and my wrath shall wax hot and I will kill you with the sword; and your wives shall be widows, and your children fatherless." "And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Vex the Midianites and smite them."

I might continue to quote at great length these hideous passages which the frenzied warriors of those barbarous ages had craftily put into the mouth of their Jewish Jehovah in order to hoodwink and intimidate their opposers; also to encourage their own army. And it is amazing to state that this ancient delusion has reached the shores of our own time—that God still continues to finger in battles at the present day. But it appears from the following that he was no more successful in battles of early times than at the present, for we read, "And the Lord was with Judah, and he drave out the inhabitants of the mountains, but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley because they had chariots of iron."

What did it matter if they did hav chariots of iron? Is it to be supposed that if God ever had any hand in war man could invent an implement that would defeat him in battle? To admit of such a thing is to assume that man is equal with God in power. In our late war of the rebellion, between the North and South, it was the firm conviction of thousands, yea, millions, on both sides of the contest that God was in their favor, and on their side alone did he assist. And this they proclaimed from the house-tops whenever they achieved a victory, but were as silent as the grave whenever met by defeat. Why did either army claim his assistance in one victory when they were defeated in the next contest? I hav been answered to the effect that God allows his elect to be defeated occasionally by their enemies in order to chastise them. Very well; but is he not favoring his enemies when he allows them to defeat his own army, which was done almost alternately during the war of the rebellion? Then upon what grounds is it claimed that there is a God of battles? Please just giv us proof of that fact. Giv us just one shadow of evidence that there was ever a power in battle superior to man? Shame on the fiendish idea of God causing one portion of his own creatures to be slaughtered by the others just in order to chastise them. If God has the power, as it is claimed, to inspire one to victory, why has he not the same power to win battles by the mere exercise of his will? The Christian who considers it a religious duty to accuse God of shedding innocent blood would stand ready to condemn the same act were it committed by mere finite man. M. L. SANDERS.

Honor the soldier who, careless of glory,
Offered his life for the life of his friend.

Down on the valleys of Piedmont in thousands
Poured from the mountains the Austrian foe;
Up at the call of the trumpet to meet them,
Alpine and Appenine marched to the Po.
Vainly her firesides in sorrow forsaken
Love from the lot of the sword would defend;
Carlo was left, and his comrade was taken,
Cæsar Manati, bis kinsman and friend.

He was the stay of his father and mother,
He was their comfort, their idol, their all;
Woe for the home and the hearts of the aged,
Sonless if Cæsar Manati should fall.
None for their proffer of gold would replace him,
Pity no hand to release him could lend;
Only young Carlo stood by to embrace him,
Daring for love to deliver his friend.

"I am an orphan," said Carlo Monaldi,
"Bound by no filial or family tie;
Better for me to be fighting your battles,
Absent unlonged for, unmissed if I die.
Better my loss than that many another
Fortune should ruin or sorrow should rend;
Duty is first to your father and mother—
Mine be the danger that threatens my friend."

Long was his pleading unheeded. "In friendship
Cæsar Manati shall not be outdone;
Never thy safety for mine"—and the soldier
Manfully shouldered his knapsack and gun.
But his strong heart, as his mother stood weeping,
Strong in its trial, gave way at the end,
And the hot tears to his eyelids upleaping
Answered their thanks to the pledge of his friend,

"A hundred pounds for Carlo Monaldi!
Nobly our hero the bounty has won,
Well shall the father reward him who, willing,
Offers his life for the life of his son!"
But the bright gold in the hand of its giver
Carlo's proud spirit could only offend.
Duty with him was no sordid endeavor,
Only a service for love of his friend.

Forth to the war went the youth in his beauty,
Nerved by affection to peril unknown,
Facing the fate that was forged for another,
Bearing the burden he chose for his own.
Fierce his heart kindled when morn o'er the river
Saw the black eagles to combat descend.
Dire was their flight, but they daunted him never,
Fearless of foes while he fought for his friend.

On to the strife where the crosses were gleaming
White on the flags of his country and king!
And the dark hosts, on the field of Novara,
Met like the meeting of storms on the wing.
Down with the Hapsburg! but shadows of ruin
Hover where patriot and tyrant contend;
Death, in the tumult of flight and pursuing,
Spares not the bosom that bleeds for a friend.

Yonder fair marble records the brief story—
"Cæsar Manati erected this tomb,
The conscript redeemed to the volunteer soldier,
Carlo Monaldi, who died in his room."
There, till expires the last grateful emotion,
Italy's sires will in pilgrimage wend,
Teaching their children love's gallant devotion,
Praising the hero who ransomed his friend.

Let the bright babes of all Christendom's mothers
In the sweet songs at their cradles be told
Of the young warrior whose knightly oblation
Points to the sweeter evangel of old.
Till the last splendors of man's self-denial
Into the glories of Calvary blend,
Where the divine one, supreme in his trial,
Perished, the sinner's redeemer and friend.

THERON BROWN.

The story of "Carlo's Sacrifice" is well told in the poem above. Cæsar Manati had been conscripted into the Italian army, but his friend, Carlo Monaldi, "an orphan," "bound by no filial or family tie," volunteers as his substitute, out of pure friendship, rejecting the "hundred pounds" with which Cæsar's father desired to reward him.

Carlo falls in battle, and Cæsar erects a monument to the memory of his self-sacrificing friend. So far, it is a good story well told; but now our poet breaks out in his final illogical and irrelevant stanza. It is like a total eclipse of the sun in its mid-day refulgence:

Let the bright babes of all Christendom's mothers
In the sweet songs at their cradles be told
Of the young warrior, whose knightly oblation
Points to the sweeter evangel of old.
Till the last splendor of man's self-denial
Into the glories of Calvary blend,
Where the divine one, supreme in his trial,
Perished, the sinner's redeemer and friend.

* * * * * * *

Ah, Theron Brown, I think, with you,
To Carlo's sacrifice is due
The glowing praise you render—
A monument that far outvies
The shaft Manati's care supplies,
With all its chiseled splendor.

I, too, once heard my country's call;
I cared not where the "draft" might fall—
I was no craven schemer;
For then to me it plainly seemed
That whosoe'er would be redeemed
Must be his own redeemer.

Had I, from love of child and wife,
Sent some one else into the strife—
My place supplied by proxy—
'Twould take, methinks, a fertil mind
In this a parallel to find
To self-styled orthodoxy.

But if I had deserted quite,
Against my country's cause to fight,
Then caught, condemned for treason,
Could Justice, with impartial eye,
Accept a friend for me to die?
No rhyme can giv it reason.

No babbling babes, however bright,
Though sweet their songs, can make wrong right,
'Tis senseless as their rattle.
Each soul in its own place must stand
To wear a coward's, traitor's brand,
Or hero's crown in battle.

In vain the murd'rer, traitor, thief,
Urges the plea of his belief
In substitution's story.
Even his Christian judges see
On earth, at least, it may not be,
And "swing him off to glory."

Irwin, Ia. J. K. P. BAKER.

[The above criticism of "Carlo's Sacrifice" is very fine, and we agree with our talented correspondent that man must ever be his own redeemer, and that each soul must stand in its own place forever.—ED. C. C.]

Joe.

Joe, of whom I write, is an Indian. He is of the Micmac tribe, and his tribal name is Spotted Horse.

I will tell you how I became acquainted with Joe, or Spotted Horse. At the close of a summer day, a messenger came up to the cottage where I was living, and said:

"Edgar wants Susie to come to the shore with her hat and shawl. He has borrowed the Indian's canoe."

I did not wait. but, snatching my shawl and hat, ran across the road and down the bluff to the edge of the water, where Edgar was paddling in a pretty birch-bark canoe.

"Come, get in, get in, and I'll paddle you over to the dock," said Edgar. "Come, I can't wait. Be spry."

But, in being spry, I nearly capsized the craft, and found myself almost on all fours, sprawling in the water that kisses the beach at Onset Bay.

"Hold on now! Wait, I tell ye. You're so—so—careless. A canoe isn't a gunboat or a battering-ram. You—look out—there—step carefully now. All right—so—squat!"

I obeyed instructions.

"Now, don't you move on the peril of your life," and Edgar's eyes glared at me dreadfully, savagely, and I did not move an inch. I scarcely breathed. We paddled along smoothly, gliding over the waters, but I never felt happier than when that canoe slipped alongside the floating dock, and I pulled myself up on its pine flooring.

Joe stood there, grinning in a ghastly way, and I then discovered that Edgar had "borrowed" the canoe without leave, while its owner was off in his wigwam, and this was the first intimation that the brave had of the whereabouts of his birchen bark. Visions of hatchets, tomahawks, sharp knives, and scalps of various hues floated before my vision.

"It's all right; you needn't be scared," said Edgar, eyeing the red man rather dubiously at the same time.

"I'm not scared by any means, but it is rather cold on the water," and, of course, I quivered some, though I spoke up bravely.

"Please, sir, you are a friendly Indian, I believe—and you won't scalp me, will you?" I looked at the Indian inquiringly.

He kept on grinning.

At last he spoke. "Me no scalpee short-haired squaw! Ho! ho! he! Me likee squaw."

So we became friends at once, and I promised him I would tell the children in the Corner all about Joe and his canoe, if he would come and spend the evening with me, which he readily agreed to do, if Arthur, the captain of the floating dock, would accompany him. Arthur said he would be glad to do so, and when they came, we passed a very agreeable evening.

Joe sang some Indian songs in his nativ tongue, and spoke the names of the inmates of our cottage in Indian language, and Arthur sang several pieces, also, in his own dialect. Joe told stories of his childhood, and of how his mamma died when he was a little pappoose. His father played the violin once for many years, but when Joe's mother died, after that his father could play no more, the strings all broke, and the violin was lifeless evermore. Joe was sent to school, and learned some, but when the teacher beat him with a rod, his proud spirit rebelled, and he would never go to school afterward.

"Why are you called 'Spotted Horse?' And why do Indians hav such names as 'Flying Cloud,' 'Bright Star,' 'Rising Sun,' etc.?" I inquired.

"Because," answered Joe, "the children are named for the first object that the mother sees after she looks on the baby for the first time."

This was said in Joe's quaint way of speaking our language:

"If the momer see big spoon, baby be named Big Spoon; if she see speckled hen, baby be Speckled Hen always; if she see the sun shining, baby be Sunlight; and so on."

We all thought that very romantic indeed. We asked a great many questions of Joe, all of which he answered intelligently—and truly, I suppose. For a wonder, Joe is a Catholic, having been trained in that faith.

"Me not much great belief in it," said he. "Best religion be to do good."

"So it is, Joe; let us practice it," we all said.

Joe was delighted to think he would be put in print, and said I must tell that he went to a picnic at Calamuet and was in a race with two other canoes, and his canoe won the race, and that next year he will hav three canoes in the waters of Onset bay, and take all the girls on the water who will care to go with him. Joe has a full Indian suit, in which he dresses sometimes. He appears quite stylish in his beaded frock and cap of feathers. The children all think he is beautiful when dressed up, and say that if they were Indians they would wish to be just like Joe, or Spotted Horse. S. H. W.

An Improved Thimble.

A friend indeed is the "Needle-threading Thimble." We hav seen ladies with poor eyesight poke, and work, and bother, and get provoked at the mere act of threading a needle. A good Samaritan has, however, arisen in the Freethought ranks, and by means of a cunning little invention attached to a thimble, remedies forever the defects of eyesight by a very simple arrangement. Another invention no less unique and useful is the "Thread-clipping Thimble," by the same good benefactor of the human race. This attachment to the thimble cuts the thread from spool, sewing machine, or cloth, thus saving teeth, eyes, or use of scissors. These thimbles ought to sell by the million, and no lady should be without one. They should be universally adopted as a great improvement over the old-fashioned thimble.

It is a matter of congratulation that our most important inventions hav been generated in the braius of Liberals, and among them may be classed W. P. Slensby, of the Slensby Manufacturing Company, 176 Broadway, New York, who has patented the thimbles above mentioned, and will be only too happy to supply the women of this world, or any other, with his improved thimble at trifling cost, twenty-five cents—and any body can afford that. 1.—ENIGMA.

My first is in flour, but not in wheat;
My second is in sour, but not in sweet;
My third is in blue, but not in black;
My fourth is in face, but not in back;
My fifth is in thrice, but not in twice;
My sixth is in tea, but not in rice;
My seventh is in bud, but not in rose;
My eighth is in shut, but not in close;
My ninth is in rain, but not in shine;
My tenth is in ring, but not in chime;
My eleventh is in frost, but not in rime.
My whole is a Liberal poet.

4.—CHARADE.

The first's an endearing name for mother,
The second should also be another—
"A well-bred woman," but, by my troth,
I think they should be mother's, both,
For three-fourths of the latter's blest employ
Is to press to her breast a little boy.
"A boy!" "a boy!" and, between the two,
It seems they hav nothing else to do
Whenever they meet, from first to last,
But to clasp a boy and hold him fast,
And worry and fret, for never yet
But a world of worriment goes with a pet.
Whooping-cough, measles, chicken-pox, mumps,
This is the way their worry jumps;
Any one or all of these,
Or any other dread disease.
That is their meeting's sole pretense,
And this of their theme is the only sense;
Alas! that even our sweets must sour,
That a spider lurks in the fairest flower,
That a pestilence rides on every breeze
Sowing the seeds of disease, DISEASE.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW. AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

ELEMENTS OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY

FOR HIGHER INSTITUTES IN REPUBLICS AND FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION.

By Prof. H. M. Cottinger, A.M.

This book is just what the busy world of to-day needs—a perfect compendium of history from 2,000 years B.C. on up to 1883, all in a nutshell.—Elmina Slenker.

As a text-book in schools, the book would occupy an important place; in the family it would be no less important, as conveying information that all should be acquainted with.—Susan Wixon.

Mr. Cottinger's intentions in writing this book are excellent, and his standpoint admirable. It may be commended as fulfilling its purpose of a concise and interesting historical text-book.—Milwaukee Sentinel.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

A Secular Funeral.

The funeral of B. Moore, of whom we spoke last week, says the Shelby, Mich., Independent, took place from the residence of his son of this place, and was well attended. The religious services were conducted by his brother, S. D. Moore, of Adrian, Mich. The following is a synopsis of his remarks on that occasion:

"FRIENDS: The occasion that has called us together is a solemn one. Death has entered the field, and another sheaf, ripe for the harvest, has been gathered in. Death is a great mystery; who can fathom it or pierce the mist that shrouds the last act of the great drama of life? The universe is a mystery. Life itself is a mystery. Whence do we come? What are we? and whither do we go? are questions that hav engaged the attention of earth's wisest and best sons and daughters from all time. He who lies silent before us believed that it was not only his privilege but his duty to attempt for himself the solution of these problems. He brought to this task an honest purpose, and an intellect of more than ordinary vigor. His desire was to know the truth, which he loved for its own sake. Error he discarded as soon as discovered. In his investigations he took reason for his guide, and, appealing to nature, lent a willing ear to her gentle teachings. Regarding himself as only responsible for good motivs and correct methods, he did not trouble himself about the conclusions to which his investigations might lead, and if his views on some of the great problems of life were different from some of his neighbors, he never dogmatized.

"Casting the robes of superstition and hypocrisy from his shoulders, he courageously followed where reason led the way; and if his interpretation of the laws of nature did not suit his neighbor, he was willing for them to interpret for themselvs. He calmly resigned himself to the inevitable, and walked down into the valley of the shadow of death with a steady step and a heart devoid of fear, trusting to Mother Nature to giv her children sleep. Conscious of having done the best he could in this world, he was willing to risk the probabilities of another. The golden streets of the New Jerusalem he knew not of; this world he did, and tried to make it a pleasant place to dwell in, and regarded a well spent life as the best preparation for death. Tired of life's fitful fever, he sought respit in eternal rest. My friends, we are all mortal. A few years ago we were not; a few more fleeting years and we will be gone and others take our places in the program of life, and we shall sleep 'beneath the shadow of the clouds, careless alike of sunshine or of storm.' But one who leads a true life need hav no fear of death or what may possibly follow after; death has no terrors but for the ignorant and superstitious.

"One who faithfully discharges his duty according to the sphere in the life he occupies has no need to recoil at leaving this state of existence. He dreads no angry being, no vindictiv spirit, from whom to expect vengeance. If at death our consciousness (as many believe) ceases; if our individuality comes to an end, and our bodies decompose and return their elements to nature from whence they came, and if the mind falls into a quiet, peaceful sleep which knows no waking, we are at least free from pain, sorrow, regret, or remorse. If, on the other hand, as many others believe, we hav a continued existence; if we pass from a crude state to one more subtle and refined, from an imperfect life to one permanent and beautiful, we surely hav nothing to fear. If there is a future life, there surely are no just grounds for believing that it will hav any more terrors than this. We shall doubtless find the same intelligent law governing there that exists here. In the grand economy of the universe birth, growth, maturity, death, and dissolution are the natural sequences of life; they are complementary parts of one great whole, and equally essential to each other.

'Life evermore is fed by death
In earth, and sea, and sky;
And that a rose may breathe its breath
Something must die.

"Let us not regard death as a dread phantom, but rather as a white messenger bringing release from the many ills of life.

"Thus believing, we accept the natural order of things, and do not rebel against fate. What we can change for our comfort and the good of humanity we gladly do; but what cannot be improved is borne with philosophical resignation. And when we shall lie down to our last solemn sleep, worn and wasted with the world's wearied warfare, though we may see no voyager's bark returning across the silent sea of the future, we bow to the inevitable, and meet with heroism the mystery of an untried existence. But we are not without hope. Our marvelously beautiful world is all alive with rich and mighty meanings. It bids us hope that even though we perish as individuals, the race will go on unfolding, and that the great tide of life will sweep on forever. Men may come and go, flowers may fade, hearts wither, generation after generation go down into the sepulcher of the ages; but none of the glorious attributes of humanity shall ever cease to be. All that is grand and good and noble and beautiful is secure from the moldering touch of time. Every disinterested deed, every generous impulse of the human heart, shall hav its own reward in peace of mind; and when our time comes to bid farewell to our friends of earth, we, like our departed brother, can say, 'All is peace within: I am ready; let me go.'

'Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And, departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time.'

"Our departed brother needs no eulogy at our hands. His good deeds speak for him. His life was a useful one. He died as he had lived, firm in his own faith, and faithful to his highest conviction of truth and duty."

At the grave a worthy tribute was given to the departed, in the words of Robert Burns:

A worthy man has gone to rest,
To rise, or lie, as heaven thinks best.
A friend of man, the friend of truth,
The friend of age, the friend of youth,
A heart was his by virtue warmed,
A head with knowledge well informed.
If there's another life, he livs in bliss;
If none, he tried to make the best of this.

Jersey Justice.

The little commonwealth, which is debatable ground in presidential contests, is famous for three products: Jersey lightning, Jersey peaches, and Jersey justice. Of the three perhaps the last can be safely relied upon as producing a never failing crop. Jersey justice is not always characterized by humanity, but as that does not enter into the strict Jersey view of the question it is not properly considered as cutting much of a figure in a point of law and order. The Jerseyman is a stickler on matters of religious etiquet, on the principle which was wittily said to actuate the Puritans, who came to New England to worship God in their own way and to prevent everybody else from worshiping in his. A week ago a heathen Hindoo, who was endcavoring to explain to a crowd of wondering Jerseymen the delights and beauties of his oriental religion, was promptly arrested for "blasphemy" and thrown into jail.

But a still finer point of Jersey justice has been developed in the little town of Keyport in the arrest of an ice-cream pedler. Upon full presentation of the facts it appears that the artist aforesaid had become involved in an altercation with another hitherto respected citizen, and at the hight of an acrimonious debate the caterer so far forgot his Jersey citizenship and the proprieties as to say, "Damn you," in a loud and violent tone, thereby signifying a contempt for his neighbor and a repudiation of all Jersey precedents as defined by the statutes. It further appears that Jersey justice swooped down upon the ice-cream specialist and bore him before the tribunal, where he was mulcted in the sum of fifty cents, the extreme penalty of the law. Fifty cents may not strike the somewhat profligate Western man as a very deterring sum, but in portions of New Jersey the expenditure thereof, without value received, would involve a good deal of serious reflection, coupled with some chastening twinges of remorse.

The highly moral element of every community will be delighted with this neat exposition of Jersey justice, which ought practically to amount to prohibition. But if an humble dealer in ice cream is assessed fifty centy for saying "damn you" to a neighbor of corresponding station, what should not he pay who defies the entire American people? Suppose that Mr. Vanderbilt, while traveling through New Jersey, had given expression to his famous bon mot, "the public be damned." At fifty cents a head, on a basis of 50,000,000 people, his fine would hav reached the tidy sum of $25,000,000, an exhibition of cumulativ punishment which would hav raised the Jerseymen far above the Medes and the Persians. The adoption of progressiv justice is the one thing necessary to put the capitalist and the ice-cream vender on a plane of equality.—Kansas City Times.

Practical Experience with Poultry.
By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical" for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

THE RISE OF
INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY
From Thales to Copernicus.
By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."
"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."
Octavo, 458 pp. PRICE, $3.50.

A STUDY
OF
BY LEWIS G. JANES.

This book treats of the natural evolution of the Christian religion, its historical antecedents in Palestinian Judaism and Roman Paganism; investigates the history of the founder of Christianity in the light of the latest scientific criticism of the New Testament; shows that the true story of the Man Jesus, and his genuin teachings are separable from the later legendary accretions which hav confounded him with the mythical Christ, and traces the natural development of Christian dogma and ecclesiastical institutions. Complete references and full index. 320pp. 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price $1.50.

"SHOPPEL'S MODERN HOUSES" No. 3.
(Just Published, July 1, 1886) CONTAINS:

A colored frontispiece showing the modern style of painting.

A cardboard supplement, ingeniously drawn and colored, to supply all the neccessary pieces for constructing a model house, with plain directions for putting them together.

While the supplement affords both old and young the greatest amusement, it is more than a toy. It is, in fact, a most practical lesson in Architecture; a perfect, scaled model of one of our most popular designs, so exact that it is useful to builders.

55 New Designs for Residences (cost varying from $500 to $15,000).
2 New Designs for Barns.
1 New Design for a Chapel.
Drawings and description of a model Kitchen (by Maria Parloa) and a perfect Cistern.
An Article on Villa Park Associations.

A MINE in Huntsville, Mo., is run on the co-operativ plan. The miners are to hav the use of the company's machinery, and to pay the latter a royalty of one cent per bushel, retaining for division among themselvs the remainder of the profits.

TEN thousand people are reported to hav gathered in Brommer's Park, this city, last Sunday to welcome Herr Liebknecht and Edward Aveling, the Socialist orators. The police were on hand and were very officious, but failed to create a disturbance.

WILLIAM E. GOULD is a son-in-law of Neal Dow; he is ostentatiously pious, and has often preached the gospel in the churches. He was cashier of a bank in Portland, Me., and has embezzled $87,000. The people in the community express great surprise that a man so pious could be such a rascal.

THE Baptist denomination has cast out Parson Downs, of Boston. Downs thanked the conference for its action, and declared that he was intending to withdraw anyway. In his reply he says: "My friends, did I care to could startle you with surprises—surprises that would make your hair stand on end, make your eyes stand out in wonder." Brother Downs was not encouraged to unbosom himself.

Odds and Ends.

PENNSYLVANIA railroads run "Camp-Meeting Specials" on Sunday instead of "Excursion trains," as heretofore. The price of beer, however, remains unchanged.

LATELY in a music-hall, after a ballad lady had warbled "Would I Were a Bird," great excitement was created by a stalwart miner in the audience shouting, "Would I were a gun!"

COUNSEL for the defense: "Gentlemen of the jury, if there ever was a case which, more than any other case, challenged careful comparison with similar cases, that case is this case."

"WHAT!" exclaimed Fogg, reading the newspaper. "Fifty Christians killed in Cochin China! For heavens sake, how many hav they got? Well, thank goodness, such a thing couldn't happen here."—Boston Exchange.

"Now, little boy, what is the meaning of the word hypocrisy?" asked an Austin Sunday-school teacher of her favorit pupil. "I can't explain what it is, but I know it all the same." "Giv me an example of hypocrisy." "When a fellow says he loves his Sunday-school teacher, that's hypocrisy."

IT can scarcely be credited, but it is said that there are even now religionists so narrow-minded that they will not allow the music of organs or other instruments in their churches. It is fortunate that such bigoted souls cannot go to heaven. They would make a disturbance attempting to throw out the harps used by some of the leading angels.—Ex.

A FARMER sent a dollar for a lightning potato bug killer, which he saw advertised in a paper, and received by return mail two blocks of wood, with directions printed on them as follows: "Take this block, which is No. 1, in the right hand; place the bug on No. 2, and press them together. Remove the bug and proceed as before."

THE new baby had proved itself the possessor of extraordinary vocal powers and had exercised them much to Johnny's annoyance. One day he said to his mother: "Ma, my little brother came from heaven, didn't he?" "Yes, dear." Johnny was silent for some time, and then he went on: "Say, ma." "What is it, Johnny?" "I don't blame the angels for bouncing him, do you?"

DEATH is the right termination of old age. When the body is worn out and the senses are oblivious to the surrounding world, when the mind is tottering and too weak to hold its thought, then man dies unconsciously. This is nature's death. Man is made to die at the end of life; to perish like the tree when its roots no longer sustain it; to fall like the fruit when the bough can no longer nourish it.—L. K. Washburn.

EVEN at the time when the pagans regarded the new sect of Christians with most abhorrence, they were forced to exclaim, "See how these Christians love one another!" It was reasonable to suppose that the victory of this religion would be the victory of love and peace. But what was the actual result? Shortly after the establishment of Christianity as a state religion, there was uproar and dissension in every city of the empire; then savage persecutions, bloody wars, until a pagan historian could observe to the polished and intellectual coterie for whom alone he wrote, that now the hatred of the Christians against one another surpassed the fury of savage beasts against man. —Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

QUEEN MARY—the bloody Mary—when she had burnt a few heretics, explained, half-apologetically, that she did not think God could be angry with her for burning the heretics a few hours for their heresy, as he would, in the next world, burn them forever for the same thing.—Bell's Irrepressible Conflict.

THE outworn rite, the old abuse,
The pious fraud transparent grown,
The good held captiv in the use
Of wrong alone—
These wait their doom from that great law
Which makes the past time serve to-day;
And fresher life the world shall draw
From their decay.

DOUBTLESS in these stages of the rise of man which are yet to be accomplished there will be ample room for the most splendid organizing genius to display itself. But it is not everybody who is endowed with such genius, and in the mean time everyone ought to do something "to widen the skirts of light." What can men do who are not geniuses or constituted for leadership? It is the old, old story; so old that you are, perhaps, getting tired of hearing it from me. But if I hav any gospel to deliver, it is this, that to each one of you, in your various vocations, in your places of business and in your homes, there is ever a better and a worse way present to your choice, but the worse way is often very pleasant-looking and inviting, and the better way is often rough and hard, forbidding and repellant. But it is by steadily choosing that which we know, or even feel, to be the better way that we become co-laborers with the infinit—not ourselvs—which makes for righteousness. Various organizations will solicit our support, and let us not withhold it when we can giv it without loss of personal independence or forfeiture of personal conviction. But first, and last, and always, let it be our highest aim to lead an individual life of thoroughgoing honesty and purity and self-control.—Chadwick's Rise of Man.

ONLY TO SEE THEE AGAIN.

What would I giv to be near thee,
Once more thy form to enfold?
What would I giv just to hear thee
Whisper my name as of old?
All that is mine of earth's treasure,
All that to me doth remain,
Freely I'd giv for the pleasure
Only to see thee again.

Long time it is since I missed you,
Down where the daisies are white;
Long time it is since I kissed you
Under the moon's silver light.
Now, where the sweet bloom is paling,
Sadly the breezes complain,
Still is my prayer unavailing,
Only to see thee again.

Only to clasp and to hold you,
How would my heart's pulses leap!
Oh! could my empty arms fold you,
Something forever to keep!
Dark hav the hours been and lonely,
All through the summer's brief reign,
Waiting and watching here only—
Only to see thee again.

Sometimes in dreams we are treading
Paths by us trod oft before;
Fond eyes their glory are shedding,
Sweet words my lost hopes restore.
Then do I cease to remember
Joys that misfortune has slain—
Ah the sad waking from slumber
Never to see thee again!—A. M. Curtis.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

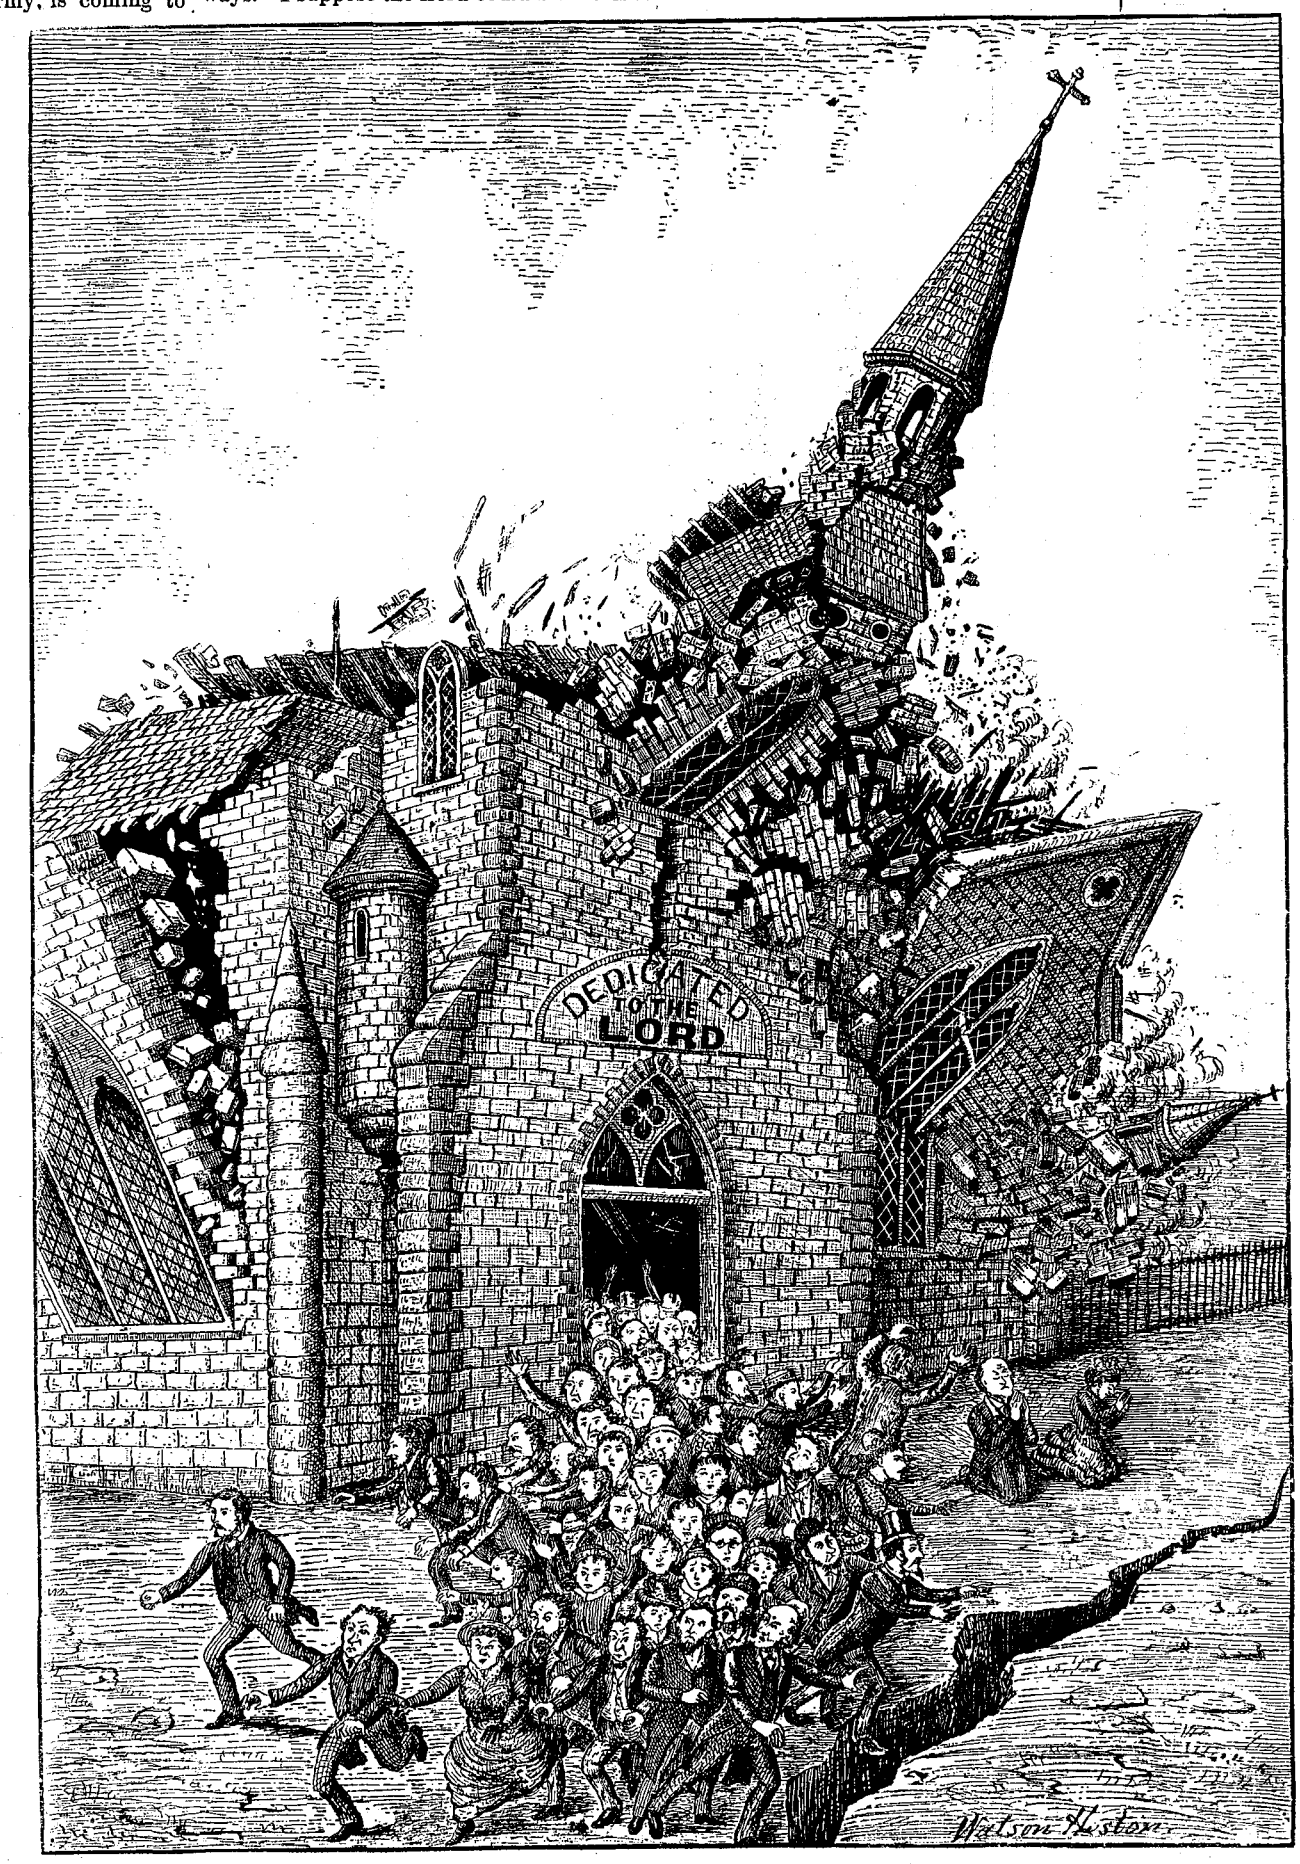
Vol. 13. No. 40. PUBLISHED WEEKLY. New York, Saturday, October 2, 1886. 33 CLINTON PLACE. $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

THERE is only one thing that softens the grief of America on being told that "General" Booth, of the Salvation Army, is coming to visit us. He leaves his Army behind.

IT is told in Boston that, after a most excellent young woman had talked earnestly to her Sunday-school class for ten minutes, one of the boys, who had been gazing into her face with the utmost attention, broke out with, "Say, teacher, you hain't moved your upper jaw since you ben talking."



"YOUNG man," said a grim-visaged passenger, solemnly, "we read in the book of books that some day this world will be destroyed by fire. What would you do in the event of such an awful emergency?" "What would I do?" repeated the young man, calmly. "I would turn the hose on, of course. I belong to the fire department."

A COLPORTEUR of the American Bible Society found in Riley, Wis., the other day, the son of a Methodist clergyman who had no Bible in his house. He wouldn't buy one and wouldn't accept one as a gift, and when the colporteur intimated that he'd leave one anyway, the bad man became very angry and put the Bible-man out of the house.

THE story is told by a Boston newspaper of a country parson who, with that tact that distinguishes some parsons, said to the local tailor: "When I want a good coat I go to Boston. That's the place. By the way, do you ever go to church?" "Oh, yes." "Where?" "Well, when I want to hear a good sermon I go to Boston. That's the place."

MR. WILLIAM C. PRIME, of this city, who for ten summers has driven through New England in his own carriage, resting on Sundays, and going to church wherever he might happen to be, says, in the New Princeton Review, that there is no disputing the fact that in the rural districts of Vermont and New Hampshire the people hav lost the habit of going to church.

A STORY is going the rounds to the effect that Senator Vest, being at dinner in Boston, was asked if he did not always request the Lord to bless the food before eating it, whereupon he said: "No, ma'am, not always. I suppose the Lord could bless this if he had a mind to, but I really havn't the cheek to ask him to." And yet the recent Bourbon state convention in Missouri, of which Mr. Vest had full control and direction, was opened with prayer.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A LESSON ON THE FOLLY OF BUILDING GOD-HOUSES

DR. PHILLIPS BROOKS says: "God shakes the earth in order to save the things which cannot be shaken." Unfortunately the learned divine has not yet furnished the public with an explanatory diagram of this remark. What are the things that cannot be shaken?

A MEETING of the members of the House of Commons interested in church defense was held September 14th to devise means for counteracting the efforts of those who favor disestablishment. A strong feeling was expressed in favor of forming an organized party in the House of Commons, with "whips" whose objects may be summed up in the phrase, "Churchmen first; politicians afterward."

DURING the thirty years ending in 1885, forty bishops of the Church of England died in Great Britain. In accord with British law, the personal property of each is sworn to by the executors. From a table recently published, we find the poorest one had $60,000 in personalty, and the richest one $700,000. They averaged $273,000 each; and some of them no doubt had real estate besides. The London Democrat remarks that an English bishop's sermon on the text, "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven," would be deeply interesting.

AMONG the old papers in the county clerk's office in Freehold, N. J., is the death sentence of a negro named Cæsar. It reads: "Therefore the court doth judge that thou, the said Cæsar, shall return to the place from whence thou camest, and from thence to the place of execution, when thy right hand shall be cut off and burnt before thine eyes. Then thou shalt be hanged up by the neck till thou art dead, dead, dead; then thy body shall be cut down and burnt to ashes in a fire, and so the Lord hav mercy on thy soul, Cæsar." No wonder New Jersey still tries to enforce blasphemy laws! It will take centuries to civilize a people so barbarous as the Jerseyites' ancestors. Mr. Reynolds had better prepare to go prison.

THE Scottish Protestant Alliance recently sent a respectful, if unwise, letter to Lord Randolph Churchill, protesting against the appointment of a Roman Catholic to the Cabinet office of home secretary. Lord Randolph sent back a vigorous answer, in which he begged to remark that he observed, with astonishment and regret, that, in this age of enlightenment and general toleration, persons professing to be educated and intelligent could arrive at conclusions so senseless and irrational. The answer that rushed back from the Alliance was also vigorous. "You hav penned an insolent reply to a respectful public document," it said. "Although you are now a Cabinet minister, we observe, with astonishment and regret, that you hav not laid aside those weapons of abuse with which you tomahawked your way to power. It is a national misfortune when men pitchforked into high position are destitute of decent manners." Honors seem to be easy between Lord Randolph and the Scottish Alliance.

GRACE GREENWOOD says that "among its other admirable manufactures, New England produces the best educated girls, the truest wives, the noblest mothers, and the most glorious old maids in the world."

THE Jewish Almanac, just published, states that there are 5,400,000 Jews in Europe, 300,000 in Asia, 35,000 in Africa, and 250,000 in America. The total Jewish population of the world is estimated at 6,300,000.

THE Brooklyn Examiner (Roman Catholic) warmly approves what C. B. Reynolds recently said at Saratoga at the Freethinkers' Association Convention, that the only authority there is for observing Sunday as a Sabbath is the pope and the Roman Catholic church. "This is perfectly true," says the Examiner, "and deserves consideration by our Protestant friends, who are such great sticklers for what they call the observance of the Sabbath."

Reminiscences of a Reformer.*

My Friends: I come before you with many misgivings lest I should fail to meet your expectations. Some years hav passed since I hav spoken much, and in that time you hav been listening to men and women of the highest order of intellect, trained in the schools to speak, not only grammatically, but in sentences rhetorically perfect. I never could boast of education or genius. My only qualifications were earnestness and a heart full of love for humanity; and so, with all my imperfections, with added years, I come to tell you some of my past life. If I shall seem egotistical, excuse me. I must, under the circumstances, be the hero of my story.

I hardly know what particular reminiscence to giv you. In a life of nearly seventy years, fifty of which hav been given to reform, memory is crowded, and you would all tire before I should get very far into such a history; but without taking time for further preface I will begin by telling you I was born of a very orthodox mother, but my father and his father before him were Universalists. Universalism seventy years ago was Infidelity. To dispute the fact of a burning hell, into which ninety-nine out of every hundred of the human family would be plunged at death, there to remain forever and forever, was blasphemy, and some of my earliest recollections are of discussions and disputations upon the subject. I hav heard my father condemned to never-ending misery by the minister of the parish in the presence of my mother, whose love for him was so great that she used to say her every breath was a prayer for his salvation. I, of course, in my early years believed or accepted my mother's creed, and when only three or four years old was afraid to die lest I should be sent to the place of burning. I knew I did not love God, and as God knew all my thoughts, he knew all my hatred for him (I was a good hater very early in life), and so would punish me for not loving so detestable a being as the God I believed in. My early years were all embittered by the fear, yes, the anticipation, of future "endless misery." Do you wonder that I hate the Christianity of the past? My pious mother died when I was six years of age, and, like other motherless children, I found many hard things to bear, though a good sister of my mother labored hard to make the path smooth for the half-orphaned little ones. I, with my sisters, was baptized in my mother's sick-room, and I was told that my chances were much better for heaven after that rite was performed. The church would now pray for me, and my mother's piety would be considered, and possibly I was "one of the elect." When I was nine years old there swept over all New England what was called a "revival of religion," and I was so excited upon the subject that in looking back to it I am amazed that I lived; I wonder that my nervous system was not entirely destroyed. At last there came a rest for a few years; the religious world was waiting to gather strength for another crusade; and the year I was twelve years of age I was converted, and supposed my salvation secured.

Would you like to know what conversion of that sort is? Read "Ideology," by the late Dr. Sunderland; you will find therein a vivid description of the whole thing. Some two years after my conversion, my father removed with his family from Berkshire county to Bristol county, Mass., and the opportunity now came to me to hear the doctrins of Universalism preached by such men as Abner Kneeland, Hosea Ballou, Walter Balfour, and others of like stamp. I accepted their interpretation of scripture, lost my belief in hell, and was so happy in the knowledge that all the human family were redeemed by and through the blood of Jesus Christ, that not one would be lost, that human life seemed to me a blessing for the first time in all the fourteen years in which I had existed. Oh, my friends, I cannot tell you how glad I am to know that these dreadful doctrins of the Christian church were not given to the world by a woman! We—that is, one of my own sex—according to the creed, ate the apple and thereby introduced sin, and at the same time knowledge; but no man has ever dared to charge upon woman the origin of this Christian doctrin. She, to be sure, is charged with yielding to the seduction of Jehovah, and thereby giving to the world a savior, to atone for the guilt of introducing to the human family the tree of knowledge. I submit it was a justifiable deed, even though it has given an example of free love somewhat dangerous, if we feel it incumbent upon us "to be followers of God as dear children."

But to return to my own history. I was married very young, became a widow at twenty-four, was again married at twenty-six, and was a mother at twenty-eight. From the day that I became a mother I date my first real work "for the life that now is." Heretofore I had worked for the imaginativ future; how void is the memory of that time! A happy wife and now a mother—no adjectiv is needed to describe the word or meaning of mother; simply mother, that is all; nothing in life excels it! Judging from my own experience, no joy equals that of motherhood. Alas! that to-day and for more than twenty-five years motherhood is only a memory! I had never realized as then the condition of the slave mother of the South, suffering all the pangs, with all the joys denied her; her child born of her own body, but she denied the privilege of caring for it. Oh! how dreadful was her situation, obliged to yield to the lust of her master, a degradation that it almost freezes my blood to think of; denied the marriage rite, treated as a brute—and even brutes do not force themselvs upon unwilling victims. I vowed on that day that I would devote my life to the cause of "woman in slavery," and as far as in me lay I hav kept the vow, and am not done yet. That was a conversion which you need not go to any book to learn the meaning of. When one really knows the needs of humanity, I think 'tis not so great a thing to die for its redemption, if you are convinced that your death will giv life to the suffering millions. Let me say that at that time I was not situated so as to go out into the world and publicly plead the cause of the oppressed. I worked at home, in the church, anywhere, and asked my husband to think of the slave at the ballot-box. I wonder how you would feel, my brothers, if you were obliged to ask your wife or sister to represent you at the ballot-box, you being denied the right to represent yourself. How reads your Constitution? "All governments derive their just rights from the consent of the governed;" and again, "Taxation without representation is tyranny."

Before eight years had passed I was again a widow, and now I made the circumstances which rendered it possible for me to go upon the public platform and plead the cause of the enslaved. You all know that chattel slavery was abolished by and through the civil war, President Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation, and the passage of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments by Congress; but perhaps you do not know that it took thirty years of activ, earnest work by men and women so thoroughly baptized into the spirit of freedom for humanity that they took their lives in their hands, and with apostolic power preached in the cities and towns "the deliverance of the captiv and the opening of prison doors to them that were bound." Such hatred was aroused by our demands for the emancipation of the slave that it was an exception to the rule if we were allowed peaceable exit from the places where we delivered our message. All the churches were closed against us; the ministers often led the mobs who assailed and insulted us. The church is to-day on the side of the oppressor; it always has been, and I think it always will be. I do not mean that every member of the church is an oppressor, but the church as a whole is never with the oppressed.

I hav been mobbed several times, and in more than one instance the mob was led by a minister, and the persons composing the mob were eminently Christian. Hav any of you ever seen a mob? Our friend Reynolds I think knows something of their nature. If you will permit me, I will tell you something about the mobs of thirty and forty years ago. I had been speaking in Ohio, and roused the ire of the Methodist church by showing their complicity with slavery. They were determined to put a stop to such exposure, and first tried smoking the building, putting pepper and tobacco upon a hot stove; then throwing hard apples, stones, brickbats, etc., at and onto the platform. At one place they had a kettle of tar and a bag of feathers outside the room—a school-house—which by great difficulty we had obtained for the use of the meeting. My friends begged me to make my escape by the window, but I was determined to speak, and did so, and finally the furious creatures, perhaps somewhat magnetized by a woman's voice, became quiet, listened to what was said, refused to use the tar and feathers, as commanded by their leaders, and in after years became antislavery men. In those days we were not only assailed in person, but our carriages were broken and besmeared with addled eggs, night-soil, or whatever filthy substance came to hand; our horses were often shorn of mane and tail, and sometimes lamed for life. We had no redress. The courts were as much our foes as was the church; we were disturbers of the peace, and the entire destruction of three millions of men, women, and children was as nothing in the balance against peace with the South.

We were obliged, like the Freethinkers of to-day, to provide a tent, and transport it to different places, as it was impossible to obtain any place in which to hold our meetings, and in one year I think we held one hundred conventions. Some few of the early Abolitionists were, like our friend Courtlandt Palmer, rich, and like him they gave of their abundance, but it was an expensiv affair to keep a paper in running order, and what can a cause do without a paper? So the money was used first for the paper, and what could be spared from that for the expenses of the speakers employed. But we depended upon the making of friends, who should feed us and giv us lodging. So our experiences were sometimes ludicrous in the extreme. Forty years ago a great many families of ordinary intelligence in the what were then Western states occupied log houses with only one room, and a loft of small dimensions, not high enough for a woman of even my short stature to stand erect in. But these people were hospitable, and many of them had emigrated from New England, and they desired our presence, and treated us just as well as their circumstances allowed. I hav been often entertained in such a home. The boys of the family would ascend the ladder and make their beds on the floor of the loft, and the proprietor of the house (no wife is ever a proprietor if the husband is living) would vacate the one room while I made my bed with his wife, and in a suitable time he would come in and in some corner make a bed of whatever he could find, disrobe, and lie down. In the morning, after making his toilet, he would again vacate the room, remain outside long enough for me to dress, and then return. Such was the way the reformers of this the nineteenth century carried on their work for the emancipation of a race suffering the most abject slavery.

When I began work for the slave I was a Christian, and believed the Bible to be the word of God. I knew there were strange things in it, but I had accepted it in my childhood, and had never reasoned upon its meaning. I had heard an interpretation which had destroyed hell, and the other matters I had not yet considered, and so I founded my argument upon a few passages supposed to be the word of God, such as, "God has made of one blood all nations to dwell upon the earth," and, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you do ye even so to them." But the clergy met me with words from the same book forbidding a woman to speak or uncover her head in public. I immediately set about finding rebutting testimony, or, rather, perhaps found my opponent clearly disobeying some requirement of the Hebrew scriptures while he accused me of being unChristian in my acts. Once or twice I completely silenced such a one by charging him with breaking one of the commands of the Bible God by shaving his face. Of course, he denied that such a command was to be found, but when I showed him the words, "Thou shalt not mar the corners of thy beard," his ignorance of the Bible was a great mortification to him. I hav known very few Christians who know much about the Bible. A few passages are enough for their stock in trade, and if one knows how easy it is to pay a Christian in his own coin, I think he may never be much in debt. If Mr. Comstock, even, as he travels about, with his gripsack filled with obscenity, could be met, and submerged with the filth of the Bible, I am sure he would escape from the contact with as little noise as possible, and perhaps confine his future depredations to something he has not yet thought about. Would you know how woman is treated in the Bible without reading too much of it? Our good friend, Miss Helen Gardener, has printed it in colors that no one can mistake. Let all women bless her. She has done what very few men or women hav ever dared to do—told to all who dare to read from whence came the laws which so degrade woman. Read her book and then send your children where the Bible is taught, if you dare.

The Abolitionist emancipated himself long before the chattel slave was freed. We found we must put humanity before all books, all customs, all religions. We were given the name of Infidel, and I came to love the name, as I usually hav loved the one who has borne it. I am sad, more sad than I can tell you, when men or women who bear that name prove recreant to right, and for selfish ends wrong others. I wish we could say such a thing could not be. But humanity is imperfect, and as yet in government power is wholly masculin. We cannot expect it to be to day what it will be when the feminin element shall take its place in perfect equality. I said we were called Infidels, and surely we were Infidel to the teachings of the church, and to the civil law that forbade us to help the flying bondman. Had I time, I could tell you of women even, and many men, who spent months, even years, in prison, because of helping those who were trying to reach a land of freedom. But even in prison we were respectable and respected, and because we were respected we were persecuted. Do you suppose even the pious people of New Jersey would tear down a tent where a dog-fight was in progress? The proprietors of such assemblages are usually Christians, and perhaps open their exhibitions with prayer. The slave-holders of the South, who debauched women and sold their babies, always maintained family prayer and supported churches. But you are tired, and I must hasten. When the chattel slave was freed, and the laws of our Northern states were somewhat amended in woman's favor, I felt that the time had come to giv up public labor. I had grown old; my labors in Washington during the war had been severe; my only child had died; my heart was broken; I felt that my work was done. But a letter from D. M. Bennett, asking me to do what I could for free speech, free mails, and the freedom to publish works of physiology and social science, so roused my deadened energies that with what of power was left me I came again to the front. Lucretia Mott told me that she promised her children that when she should reach sixty years of age she would step down from the "high seats" in her church, retire from the rostrum, and rest; but when past four score she was still speaking—she had found no time to rest. I hav reached the year that will complete my three score and ten, but find it hard to feel that my work is done. I am alone, hav outlived all my own family and all my father's. Were it not that I love my race, love would die, as hav those on which love was fed. But all humanity is to-day my family, and I am not willing, not quite ready, to leave the family to a new parentage. A step-mother is often much more capable, and will do even better by the family than did the own mother; but what woman believes her children can be loved by another as she loves them? And so, friends, I cannot giv up my right to work in the work of reform, even with the knowledge that you are younger, abler, and will do so much better. Let me work on for a little longer. How many of our friends are already gone! Who can fill the place of Elizur Wright—always ready with voice, pen, and purse? Surely he was one of the very best and wisest of the sons of men. But the departed are more than they that remain, and the best honor we can giv to their memories is to continue the work which was so dear to them with unflagging zeal.

LUCY N. COLMAN.

The Church and Its Influence.

From a flat and central earth up to the scientific triumphs of the nineteenth century the church has contested the ground inch by inch, denouncing scientists as heretics and Infidels, and declaring before the world that their doctrins were only calculated to bring the word of God into disrepute, and drag the souls of men down to hell.

Until the ideas of God-written books and divine intervention are given up, the hand of the church will be found at the throat of science, and human progress be retarded.

After Galileo had constructed his little telescope, in 1610, he discovered the moons of Jupiter. Here was the Copernican system in miniature—four worlds revolving around a center. The spiritual autocrats were not slow in detecting the results of this discovery.

It had been urged by the church that, if the Copernican theory was true, the interior planets, Mercury and Venus, ought to show phases like the moon. The keen, scientific eye of Galileo at once saw the force of the objection, and honestly admitted the truth of the position, but urged that these planets were at such immense distances from the earth that, although these phases did actually take place, the unaided human eye was too feeble to perceive them, and that it was philosophically correct that they should appear in the heavens as mere points of light.

On turning his telescope to these planets, what must hav been the ecstasy of his soul when he found that he was able to declare to the church and to the world that these phases were a reality! But his declaration only gave the church the greater alarm. Ecclesiastics everywhere denounced his discoveries as blasphemous frauds, and declared that whoever should look through his glasses would see more devils than planets.

He was summoned before the Inquisition to answer to the charge of promulgating a theory utterly at variance with the holy scripture. Knowing the power of the law, and fearing the feline disposition and the jaw and the paw of the church, Galileo yielded to its demands, and swore upon the "holy gospels" never more to teach the damnable heresy.

A great scientist had been silenced, the church was at rest; but in 1632 the holy waters were again roiled from the very bottom. Galileo was again summoned before the Inquisition. He had written his "System of the Worlds." It was declared that he had brought upon himself the penalty of heresy, which was to be burnt alive. To escape this terrible penalty, he again went down upon his knees, with his hand upon the Bible.

What a degrading spectacle! Where are your curses, O ye indefatigable, toiling sons of science? Think of it, ye scientists of the nineteenth century! This grandest, noblest man, who flashed such a flood of light upon the world, down upon his knees, and forced to take an unholy lie into his mouth at the bidding of the assassins of science!

He was thrust into prison, and the last ten years of his life rendered as painfully unhappy as a lot of relentless bigots could make them. When, at last, death came to his relief, he was put out of sight with as little ceremony as would attend the burying of a mad dog. As long as I liv I will denounce a system which has caused men to treat the world's greatest benefactors with such unfeeling brutality.

Seven years after the death of Copernicus an individual was born whose life was scarcely less conspicuous. He wrote "The Infinity of the Universe of Worlds," and other works on kindred subjects. He was proscribed by the church, and made a wanderer in foreign lands. He was finally arrested and imprisoned for six years, without books, paper, or friends. Subsequently he was removed from the prison at Venice to the prison at Rome, and accused by the Inquisition of "teaching the doctrin of a plurality of worlds," a doctrin at once repugnant to the whole tenor of the scriptures and the great plan of salvation." He was found guilty of the charges as alleged, and Giordano Bruno was sentenced to be burnt alive in the city of Rome, Feb. 16, 1600.

Friends, let us join hands and swear on the sacred altar of human rights never to giv up the struggle until the last throb of life is choked out of the persecuting old hag of superstition, and the mind of man is free.

To-day steps are being taken to slap the bloody old church in the face. Contributions are being received to erect a monument right under the shadow of St. Peter's church at Rome, in honor of the scientific martyr who was burnt by Christian bigots for teaching just what every intelligent man knows to be true.

The fallacy of a flat and central earth had to go, although the church went to the extreme of its crushing power, even to torture and death, to keep alive the faith in an infallible church and a God-written Bible. It was declared that "a belief in the Copernican theory would completely undermine the church."

Although the church thundered forth its terrible curses upon all who dared to believe the damnable doctrin, yet, in spite of hell fire and the fear of losing a title to mansions in the skies, the doctrin was believed, and, according to the church's own showing, the infallible Bible and infallible church went to the wall.

The Bible and the priesthood had been final authority on all matters of science, and to hav the backbone of that authority broken was a severe blow to the church.

But her hands were still dripping with blood shed to suppress the Copernican heresy when the church found another difficulty to encounter. The church demanded that all history and science should be made to conform to the Bible. This showed the earth to be of comparativly recent date—not more than four or five thousand years old at the birth of Christ.

When men began to study and interpret the language of the rocks, it was found that the book of Genesis was a big lie. It is demonstrated that the river Nile has been flowing where it now does for a period of time reaching beyond the time of creation, as laid down in the book of Genesis, many thousands of years, showing that the evidence was not all in when the Mosaic account of creation was written.

The ruins of a city hav been found covered with mud, which, according to the Bible account, is older than the earth. The mud brought down by the waters of the Nile causes the bed of the river to rise higher and higher each year, and consequently as the bed of the river is elevated the waters flow farther and farther inland each year, and deposit a new layer of mud. By measuring the depth of these deposits the facts hav been arrived at as above stated.

It would be foreign to our purpose to giv a detailed account of the struggle between the church and the science of geology. It was a bloodless struggle, but, as in the other cases, science triumphed and the church again went to the wall.

Is it not strange that, with an infallible book as a guide, in every encounter with science the church has been beaten. Mosheim furnishes the key to the secret. He says: "There was nothing to exclude the ignorant from ecclesiastic preferment. The savage and illiterate party who looked upon all kinds of learning, particularly philosophy, as dangerous, was increasing. The will of their councils was determined by a majority vote, and, to secure that, all manner of intrigues were resorted to. The influence of court females, bribery, and violence were not spared."

And yet by such decisions of such councils the scriptures of the New Testament were made the word of God.

Yes, and by these councils it was held to be an act of virtue "to deceive and lie," when by such means the interests of the church might be promoted. And so by these councils it was decided that "errors in religious belief," after proper admonitions of the church, were punishable by the civil power with "penalties and tortures."

To show the moral and intellectual standing of society when the church had full sway, it may be stated that for six hundred years trial by water and by fire, by combat and by the cross, was in vogue.

If a man was accused of any crime, he was thrown into the water—if guilty, he sank; if innocent, he floated. In other cases the accused was made to walk over hot plates of iron—if guilty, he was burnt; if innocent, God protected him. In cases of dispute two champions were chosen, and truth or falsehood was established by a hand-to-hand fight—if the accused could hold out his arms like a cross longer than the accuser, he was judged innocent.

There are cases on record where innocent parties who were physically disabled were thrown into water and did not sink. In other cases innocent parties walked barefoot over plates of hot iron and were not burnt. Such were the modes of establishing justice in the palmy days of the church.

For more than a thousand years all Europe was filled with holy men, miracle-workers, superstition, saints, lying, deceit, ignorance, and crime. The church councils, ruled by ignorance and hypocrisy, had not only produced this result, but had established the truth of miracles and the sacred character of the New Testament. But the time came when such monstrous notions were not only doubted, but openly derided.

To stem the tide of opposition, and keep the cause from open ridicule, the Inquisition and auricular confession were instituted.

Private confession turned those of one's own household, even his wife and children, into spies. The Inquisitors were on the track of every man, clothed with power to enter any house, town, or city. No place was exempt from their search. And with such ferocious Christian instincts did they carry on their diabolical work that from 1481 to 1808 they had punished no less than 340,000. Of these, 32,000 were burnt alive. A thought of the Inquisition still curdles the blood.

The inventiv ingenuity of the age was taxed to produce instruments of torture. Delicate little instruments were invented to put on the fingers and toes, operated by a thumb-screw, so as to reduce the flesh to pulp or even crush the bone.

Sometimes the subject would be bound in such an unnatural position that the pain was most excruciating, and then these little Christian bull-dogs were put on the fingers and toes, and every few hours another turn of the screw, and this kept up for days and nights together, every throb a messenger of death mounting up to the brain, with no relief but death. Thus in the darkest dungeon, where no friend could hear her wailing cry, many and many a helpless woman has met her death. And then to think of a hypocritical priest coming into the presence of such a suffering subject with a crucifix in his hand and reminding her of the "just punishment which God is inflicting upon her" for something she may hav said to the injury of God's holy cause!

Another instrument of torture consisted of an iron ball, somewhat larger than a musket ball, with a "long iron stem to it of the size of a pipe-stem." The subject was confined in an immovable position; then the ball was brought to a red heat and pressed upon the eye until it fried and bubbled in the socket. Such were the means adopted to impress the people with a love of God and fill them with reverence for his holy word.

Think you I would not hav believed in the inspiration of the Bible? Why, at the first turn of the thumb-screw I would hav believed that the earth is flat and made out of nothing. I would hav believed in the fall, in the plan of redemption, the flood story, the Jonah story, the story of the talking jackass, in all the miracles and impossibilities which were ever written, with "Baron Munchausen," "Sinbad the Sailor," and "Gulliver's Travels" thrown in.

History furnishes no account of meaner deeds than were perpetrated by the church. The selling of indulgences for the commission of the vilest crimes shows how much God was directing the affairs of the church. Indulgences for the commission of the same crime were sold by different ecclesiastics for different prices.

Abbots and monks perambulated the country with old relics, and vast sums of money were raised for the church for looking upon or touching these holy impositions. These relic-drummers entered into sharp competition with each other in regard to the sanctity of their respectiv relics. Of course God was directing these precious Christian practices. Could Christians go wrong when they were guided by God's holy word? The church, guided by God's holy word, affirmed that the earth was flat, and the most important body in the solar system. But science, without any help from God, demonstrated that neither the church nor the Bible could be relied upon as authority. On the authority of the Bible, the church affirmed a universal deluge. Science has shown that no such catastrophe ever occurred, and that the church and the Bible were in error. The church affirmed, on authority of the Bible, that the first man was created with a high degree of intelligence, and with moral and physical perfection. The book of geology was opened, and the history of man as there recorded shows that man was on the earth thousands of years before the time assigned in the Mosaic account, and instead of being a type of perfection was elevated but little above the brute.

If the Christian can ever wake up enough, he will see why there is an ever-widening breach between science and the Bible. The world has grown much wiser since the Bible was written. The experience of two or three thousand years has been worth a great deal. The men who wrote the Bible and those who lived in Bible times would not compare with men of the present day. There was not the facility for making great men that there is in modern times.

Yet the Christian believes that old Moses, rummaging round in the woods for forty years of his life, was far superior to the best man in our day. And he believes that the Bible, written by semi-barbarians, is superior to the choicest production of the best brains of modern times. Such belief has turned the church into a huge giant with a great club ready to beat the brains out of every scientist who conceives an idea above a flat earth.

Is it any wonder that a man who believes the story of Jonah and his pet whale should denounce such men as Darwin, Tyndall, and Huxley as Infidels? Until the Christian can be brought to see the difference between reason and inspired ignorance, between science and superstition, he will regard the ball and chain which designing ecclesiastics hav fastened to his limbs as an ornament, and fight for the privilege of wearing it. News and Notes.

West Union, Iowa, is a quite attractiv place, amid the many trees, and the swelling uplands, almost like hills in this prairie country. The only drawback is that there are nine churches to about two thousand inhabitants. This makes quite an overpowering orthodox sentiment, although the churches are not financially strong. I guess it is "poor pay" and "poor preach." One of the clergymen receives only two hundred dollars a year salary, and that is not a very loud call of the Holy Ghost. One can't be very eloquent on such rations. There is a pretty good Liberal element at West Union and throughout the county. Several friends came from a distance, and so we had a sort of convention. The county fair was going on at the same time, and this gave the town a holiday aspect. The governor of the state was there and added to the dignity of the occasion. The brass band kept pealing forth its martial strains, and was exhilarating. The streets and grounds were crowded with men and women, and handsome carriages and horses, and the balloon went up splendidly and the acrobats displayed gracefully, and the races were really exciting when the steeds were fairly under way. The exhibition of handiwork by the ladies was excellent—the pictures, the painted china ware, the stuffed birds, and especially the crazy quilts. The women, I see, hav a wonderful faculty for making crazy quilts. I wonder if this is a development of their "inward consciousness." The metaphysics of the case are quite puzzling, as are the quilts themselvs; I like to look at them, but I should be afraid to sleep beneath their dazzling folds. What dreams might come! The fruits were delicious, and the cattle were superb and the hogs fat, and I really enjoyed this exhibition of a healthy and wealthy country life. The county fairs are good Liberal institutions. They educate the people, who get better ideas and acquaintance by their means. The governor, who is himself a practical farmer, and had some fine stock on exhibition, gave an address on the improvement of products, etc. General Prentiss, the hero of Shiloh, was present, and gave an exceedingly interesting account of that great battle, which was so stubbornly fought. General Prentiss is a mild sort of a Methodist, and confesses to an occasional prayer. However, he is a warm admirer of Ingersoll, and so I shall not quarrel with him. I enjoyed making his acquaintance, and found him a sociable and good fellow, as well as a modest and brave soldier, who deserves well of his country.

Amid these many pleasant surroundings I gave my three lectures at West Union to full houses, and they were cordially received. Some of the ministers were present, and one of them took voluminous notes. I invited a reply, but none came. I suppose the thunders will begin to volley after my departure.

I went out and spent a night on the farm of I. F. Smith. He has been in this country since 1853—from boyhood—and although in the prime of life, he is now one of the "oldest inhabitants." He has a pleasant situation indeed, with beautiful fields and groves on all sides. The views are broad and rich, and one could not find in all the world a country-seat in the midst of more delightful prospects. Mr. and Mrs. Smith and all their children are Liberals, and so their home is cheerful, and my pilgrimage found here a happy rest and change.

Mr. J. S. Brewer is one of the most earnest workers in our ranks. He was formerly of the Methodist church. The superstition has gone, but the zeal abides, which is a good thing. I was pleased to meet so noble a spirit. Mr. F. B. Zigler, who introduced me at the lectures, is one of the leading citizens of the place. He has been all over the world, and has a well-furnished mind, for he is both a thinker and an observer. He has been several times to the "holy land," and his lectures upon that topic are quite popular. Even the orthodox churches are desirous of his services, and he generously givs them that which is both entertaining and instructiv. He has a beautiful home at West Union, and his hospitality was a delight indeed for both the mind and body. Mrs. Zigler is equally Liberal, and has been with her husband in his many journeyings, and is a charming hostess. So I found West Union a delightful haven, and my work was a joy.

Mr. Wallace, Mr. Thos. Reeder, Mr. G. E. Hennig, I. H. Schreicker, and others of West Union are also friends whom it was a pleasure to meet.

O. H. Garretson, of Salem, Iowa; Alex. Risk, of Putnam; Wm. Redfield and wife, of Olwein; Warren Goddard and brother, of Cedar Rapids; S. C. Smith, of Alpha; Gust. A. Kohn, of Nashua; Daniel Davis, of Fayette; H. F. Dean, of Castalia; J. Daniels and wife, of Ossian; T. E. Delamore, of Wadena, were among those present from abroad, and it will be seen that we had quite a gathering of the Freethinkers of northern Iowa. Remsburg has been here before and is coming again, so the work is going prosperously on, and without doubt orthodoxy will grow "small by degrees and beautifully less."

An all-night ride brings me to Chicago, and then a morning ride of sixty-odd miles takes me to Chebanse, and here I am met by Jos. Haigh, and taken to his home, a farm just outside the village, of one hundred and sixty acres, which he took up over thirty years ago. In perfecting his claim he had to go to Danville, a distance of seventy-five miles. He walked the first day, which was a Sunday, sixty-three miles. This is good traveling for a "Sabbath day's journey," and I don't know that any Christian pilgrim, even en route to the celestial city, could beat that record. Mr. Haigh and his brother Edward—both originally from England, but coming from Canada to Illinois—hav always been outspoken Freethinkers and made it lively for the slow-going orthodox. Mr. Haigh has been quite a writer. He has written about a hundred poems on Freethought and other matters, among them "The Prayer to the Unknown God," and "Why Don't God Kill the Devil?" The latter has been utilized by friend Babcock in his lively satire of the same name. Mr. Haigh has also written a valuable history of Chebanse, and contributed much to the columns of the local papers. Dr. De Veling is another stanch Liberal soldier, and he has done some good fighting and will do more. He also came here thirty years ago. He has a large practice and an honorable position.

I was quite unfortunate in regard to the weather at Chebanse, and the campaign was disarranged. On Saturday night, just at the hour for meeting, the lightnings flashed constantly all along the horizon, and the thunder growled ominously. A few, however, met at the appointed place, and I gave my lecture, but before it was over the rain came in torrents, and it was an hour before we could plunge into the darkness and seek our homes. On Sunday afternoon we were to hav an out-door meeting at Smith's Grove, Sugar Island, and if it had been pleasant I should hav had a congregation of hundreds, but the thunder and the rain and the mud compelled a change, and we had to hold a sort of extemporaneous meeting in the hall in the village, and make the best of it. In spite of Dame Nature's tremendous frowns, we had some fun, anyhow, and some enthusiasm was created, and there was no discouragement. Without doubt a Secular Union will be formed here, and the work pushed forward.

Friends came twenty-five and thirty miles, in spite of the weather, to hear the lectures, and it givs one good cheer indeed to find such deep and wide interest in Freethought. Mr. Beery, of Gilman; Mr. Antoine Johnson and wife, of Buckingham; R. H. Enos, of Kankakee; G. Gunnison, of Hereher, and family, were on hand, and their cordial greeting made up for the other disappointments of the occasion.

I am now in Chicago, in the midst of its immense life, which givs me new vigor. I am meeting old friends. I shall lecture here on Sunday, and in the mean time see the sights and study this great world. Stevens is with me, and it is a delight to meet this enthusiastic soul, who believes so thoroughly in justice and liberty, and who has so clear an understanding of the issues of the hour. I shall see much and learn much while here, especially of the tragic side of reform.

I am at Belding September 28th and 29th; at West Union, O., October 1st, 2d, and 3d; at New York, October 5th. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Important Notice.

ANNUAL CONGRESS OF THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION.

The chairman of the Executiv Committee desires to call the attention of all local Secular societies to the approaching annual Congress to be held at Chickering Hall, November 11 to 14, 1886.

In accordance with the constitution, Article 5, all charter-members and life-members of the American Secular Union, and all duly accredited delegates from local Secular societies holding charters from the National Liberal League or American Secular Union, are entitled to seats and votes in the annual Congress.

Annual members are entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the annual Congress. All such officers, delegates, and members who intend to be present at the annual Congress are requested to write me immediately, so that the necessary lists may be perfected and the necessary tickets entitling bearer to seat in the Congress can be furnished in season. Article 16 provides that every local auxiliary Secular society, organized in accordance with the provisions of the constitution, shall be entitled to send its president and secretary and three other members as delegates to the annual Congress.

Article 17 provides that it is the especial duty of the secretary of each local Secular society to furnish the secretary of the American Secular Union with a complete list of all the members, with their post-office addresses in full, and a list of the officers.

The prompt compliance by the secretary of every local Secular society in the United States and Canada with Article 17 is absolutely necessary.

All auxiliary societies that hav not received charters are especially requested to at once send full list of members, with names and post-office addresses of the officers, together with the charter fee of five dollars. This should be done immediately, so that the society can be entered on the roll and its delegates admitted to the Congress. All auxiliary societies, duly organized, are requested to at once call a special meeting and elect three delegates to the Congress.

Secretaries will confer a special favor on the chairman of the Executiv Committee and facilitate comfort and convenience of members by promptly sending me names and post-office addresses of president, secretary, and the three delegates elected, and also the names and addresses of all members of their societies and other friends in their vicinity who propose to attend the Congress. C. B. REYNOLDS,

The New York Congress.

The date is fast approaching when the tenth annual Congress of the American Secular Union will take place. The fact that it is to be held in the fine Chickering Hall in the city of New York, and that it will be addressed by some of America's greatest speakers, including Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, should be sufficient to inspire all friends of the Union throughout the States and Canada to concentrate their efforts in the endeavor to make the gathering the most successful one ever known in connection with the Liberal movement in this country. There are, however, other important considerations which ought to induce friends to render special support to this annual assembly, and those are the supreme value of the objects sought to be achieved in calling the Congress together. Briefly, these are to giv public recognition to the progress made during the past year within our ranks; to devise plans for future advancement; to giv a varied and dignified exposition of Liberal principles, and to strengthen the bonds of mutual cooperation. The respectiv officers of the Union hav an encouraging record of work done since our last meeting, and a useful program as to future action. These will be presented to the Congress, and should command the earnest attention of every delegate present.

The necessity of presenting our distinctiv principles before the public cannot be doubted at the present time. Liberal views as to all questions of a theological character are rapidly permeating the minds of all classes of society. This diffusion of Secular light will continue so long as people read, think, and enjoy the advantages of free speech and a free platform. One of the features of the Congress will, no doubt, be to indicate how these views can be consolidated upon the broad principle of mental freedom and intellectual liberty. A destructiv policy is still a necessity, but constructiv work is equally desirable. Can the two be wisely blended in the propaganda of the Union? This is another point for the attention of the Congress. When it is in session, I shall be pleased to offer a few suggestions upon this head.

Our success as an organized body would be the greater if the many who are now apathetic, exhibiting too much mental reservation, were to come forward as declared standard-bearers in the cause of Secular truth. Probably one way of bringing about this desirable result is to prove the importance of our principles and to demonstrate that the surest way to make them popular and keep them so is to hav an efficient organization. No movement, however great, no teachings, however sublime, adequately succeed without this adhesiv force.

In this practical commercial age, if a man is known by his fellows as an honest, consistent worker in the path of ethical conduct, he has little to fear because he does not subscribe to the popular creeds and dogmas. What the Secular movement requires more than ever is the display of courage of well thought-out convictions upon the part of its adherents. The man of fortitude may be compared to a castle built upon a rock which defies the attack of surrounding waters, whilst he who lacks the courage of his opinions is as a hut placed on the shore which every wind shakes and every wave overflows.

Let all, in the sacred name of duty, who avow themselvs Liberals, Freethinkers, or Secularists, show their love for the cause they profess by uniting in the resolve not only to be present at the Congress, but when there to do their best in assisting to realize the objects of the meeting and thus increase the happiness of human brotherhood, the usefulness of the Union, and the scope of moral and intellectual freedom. CHARLES WATTS.

Liberal Organization in New York.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The earnest attention of all people who are not under the control of the old superstitions is requested to the following circular from the officers of the Freethinkers' Association of the state of New York. The objects of the Association are expressed in the appended constitution of the Association and the resolutions which hav been passed unanimously at the last two Conventions of the Association—the one held at Albany last year, and the one lately held at White Sulphur Springs, Saratoga. This Association is the only general association of Liberals for this state, and its officers hav been directed to proceed at once to effect county or local organizations in order to generally promote its objects, and also to afford to those who are not connected with the churches a truer and better basis for social intercourse and mutual assistance.

How this constructiv Liberal work can be best commenced must be determined by the Liberals in each county for themselvs, as the circumstances of no two localities are the same. I wish to call attention, however, to the very practical report of Mr. C. F. DeMott, of Hempstead, L. I., N. Y., as an example worthy of imitation. Certainly his earnest words in favor of immediate action should lead to some earnest effort in every county, city, or town where two or three may be gathered together.

T. B. WAKEMAN.

HEMPSTEAD FREETHOUGHT ASSOCIATION.

TO MR T. B. WAKEMAN, Dear Sir: As you request a report of the work done in the town of Hempstead, Queens county, N. Y., I submit the following:

First, as an illustration and proof of the potency and usefulness of our annual conventions, I wish to say that the work accomplished here is mainly due to the inspiration, if I may use the word, or the enthusiasm, diffused at last year's convention. While at Albany, and listening to the earnest words of our noble workers, and especially to the thoughtful address of our president, I was convinced of the importance of doing some activ missionary work in my own town. I came home determined to start an organization, however small, in Hempstead, that should tend to popularize religious free thought and Secular principles. I was the only person in the village who dared publicly express an opinion against the tyranny of the church, or do anything in the way of Secular propagandism. The people were extremely orthodox. There had never been a Freethought lecture or address heard in our village; but two or three Liberal papers came to our post-office; Freethinkers and Infidels were regarded as pure specimens of total depravity. But, living within a radius of ten miles, I knew there were six or eight outspoken Freethinkers three of whom were also at the convention—but we were unacquainted at the time. To these I wrote, requesting them to aid me in starting an organization. I found them ready, and even anxious, only waiting for a leader. After due consideration, we decided to organize temporarily as a "Progressiv Reading Club," the objects being "intellectual and social improvement." The temporary organization was effected, and meetings appointed every Sunday afternoon at my residence. Scientific works were read and discussed; original essays written and read before the Club; selections from the Rig-Veda, Path of Virtue, and other so-called sacred books were read, and the thoughts of these ancient people compared with those of the Bible writers, the objects being to awaken thought and lead the minds in the right direction. These meetings were continued all winter, and attracted considerable attention. Reports of each meeting were published in the local papers, and the people were favorably impressed.

On June 7th we reorganized as a Freethought association, our object being, as expressed in the constitution, "to disseminate scientific knowledge, increase religious free thought, and to work for the promulgation of Secular principles." Officers were elected as follows: President, C. F. DeMott; vice-presidents, Robert B. Jackson, Elisha Hyatt; secretary, H. H. Geer; treasurer, Franklin H. Mollineoux. A vigilance committee was appointed, consisting of the president, first vice-president, secretary, and two members. To this committee all applications for membership must be referred. Nine members at once signed the constitution and by-laws. Of course, some of our young friends who had met with us as a "Progressiv Reading Club" were so badly frightened at the word "Freethought" that they hav not yet recovered sufficiently to show themselvs at our meetings. 'Tis ever thus. A neat room was rented next to the post-office and nicely fitted up with carpet, chairs, tables, and portraits of Ingersoll, Paine, and other distinguished Freethinkers. Liberal mottoes were hung up among the pictures. A large lot of scientific and Freethought books and papers was brought in by the members and the only reading-room in the village thrown open to the public. Very fortunately being a stenographer, I advertised to giv free instruction to all who would study and practice this useful art every Tuesday and Thursday evening. This has been continued all summer with ever-increasing interest and good results. The reading-room is open every Tuesday and Thursday evening, and on Sunday from one o'clock. Every Sunday at three o'clock we hav either a scientific lecture, select reading, or Secular address. We hav held six grove meetings during July and August, all of which were well attended both by Christians and by those who, although in sympathy with our movement, lack the moral courage to join our association. We hav distributed quite a large quantity of Freethought and Secular literature, which is producing the usual good results.

We are now making arrangements for securing a larger room, and intend fitting up a small gymnasium for the use of members only. Classes in natural history and physiology are to be started next Sunday.

Reports of our work are published in three or four local papers, as well as original Liberal articles and selections from Ingersoll and our best writers.

Our members are men and women of sound principle, respected by all who know them, and we can depend upon every one of them as a member for life.

We hav met no opposition from the church party to speak of, except a very cruel remark from a Methodist Episcopal clergyman declaring that the president of our association had no affiliation with his Lord and master, Jesus Christ. We survived, however, and shall move onward to a glorious victory.

And now let me say to my fellow-Freethinkers, Organize—organize in every township and election district—organize though there be but three or four good, earnest men or women. Be constructiv as well as destructiv; teach men, women, and children how to think; teach astronomy, geology, history, physiology. Open a reading-room where all can come and learn what the word Freethought means. United, organized effort will command attention and respect that individual, spasmodic movements will not. Organize on the simple basis of Freethought; tell the people that they may believe in all the gods they please, in all the heavens they please, in all the ghosts they please, but if they believe in free thought, free investigation, free discussion (and who does not?), they should be with you as members of your society; and you will be surprised to find how many will come. After you organize, stick to it month after month, whether any new members come or not; many will wait just to see whether you mean business or not, and when they find you do they will admire your courage and persistence, they will come to your support and sustain you in the noble work. Do not say, "Oh, my business will suffer; the church people will refuse to patronize me." There is nothing more false than this. I know from experience that the church people will admire you for your courage and candor; they will patronize you the more for being faithful to your honest convictions. The great majority of the church people are really in sympathy with you and will secretly admire and welcome you as one who opens the prison door and lets in the glorious sunlight. I know this is so, not alone in Hempstead, but in every town and village throughout the land. Organize, then, wherever three or four Freethinkers can meet once a week, and you will find hundreds in sympathy with you; the clouds will giv place to beautiful sunlight, and the sneers and frowns will turn to smiles and words of praise.

Fraternally yours, C. F. DEMOTT.

Hempstead, Sept. 15, 1886.

TO THE FREETHINKERS OF NEW YORK STATE.

Organization is absolutely essential to the success of the Liberal cause. The church realizes the power which social and educational facilities insure. Thousands indifferent to her creed yield her allegiance for the sake of the social advantages she affords. If all Liberals should avow their convictions, all would be greatly encouraged, for it would be at once apparent that in numbers and influence they equal any of the Christian denominations.

Realizing these truths, the New York Freethinkers' Association, at their recent convention, held at White Sulphur Springs, Saratoga, N. Y., marked out a course of procedure which, if energetically followed, cannot fail to insure success to the cause.

To awake a spirit of enthusiasm, the Executiv Committee were directed to select some able and devoted Liberal in each county as vice-president, such a person to select two associates, and the three will constitute the county committee and hav general supervision of the work in their own county. They are requested to seek out and report to the secretary of the Association the names of those favorable to Liberalism in their county. Wherever there are one or more Liberals in a town or school district, such persons should be visited or corresponded with and be supplied with papers, leaflets, and Liberal literature for gratuitous distribution. They should be encouraged to use every endeavor to obtain subscribers to our Liberal papers and magazines, and as soon as interest is awakened the Executiv Committee will send to such neighborhood the most suitable lecturer and organizer they can find.

The Executiv Committee will supply the county committees with leaflets and documents containing concise arguments and the evidence in regard to Christianity and Liberalism in its constructiv character, written in a spirit of love and candor that will, they hope, awake to thought without arousing prejudice. The Executiv Committee will prepare pamphlets, leaflets, hints, and suggestions, showing how to form local Secular societies, how to conduct meetings, how to carry on science schools on Sundays without professional teachers. The Executiv Committee will also prepare by-laws showing the duties of officers, committees, etc.

This work will, of course, require the coöperation and more solid organization and support of all the Liberals of the state. We ask you, therefore, to join the Association and support it by work in your neighborhood, and by a contribution to the treasury to secure these results. The membership fee for one year is only twenty-five cents, payable in advance, and we urge you to at once renew your membership or become a member. Finally, in order to supply the means to send an organizer into such places as need his services, it was voted by the Association to ask every Liberal in the state for a donation of at least one dollar. This donation will also constitute the donor a member.

All money received, and all expenditures, to whom paid, and for what, will be published each month in THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator.

Relying on your known zeal and devotion to the Liberal cause, we confidently await your prompt and generous response. Yours for the cause, F. C. REYNOLDS, Sec'y.

Address all letters and make drafts and money-orders payable to Mrs. F. C. Reynolds, secretary of the New York Freethinkers' Association, Box 104, North Parma, N. Y.

Canadian Notes.

The annual convention of Canadian Secularists was held at Science Hall, Toronto, on September 10th, 11th, and 12th, and, although it was not so well attended as had been hoped, yet the work accomplished will perhaps rank in importance with that of any like event in the past.

The country was fairly represented, delegates being present from Welland, Meaford, Muskoka district, Alton, Oshawa, and several other places.

On Friday evening President Algie opened the convention and in an excellent address gave an account of the work of the past year, and explained the plans and objects hoped to be attained during the year to come.

After preliminary business and appointing committees, the meeting adjourned until Saturday evening, when the various committees reported and the real work of the convention began.

The committee on resolutions brought in the following report:

WHEREAS, The Canadian Secular Union having encountered grave obstacles in the organization of local Secular societies in the smaller cities and towns, and having also had some difficulty in finding sufficient local talent to continue in activ existence many local or branch societies that hav already been organized; be it

Resolved, That strenuous efforts be made by our central executiv to bring into membership in our organization every Freethinker and Secularist living in Canada, believing that our forces will thus become consolidated, and that our policy in the past of expending our energies in the formation of branch societies be made a secondary consideration; that the central executiv be requested to frame an appeal to all Freethinkers requesting their personal coöperation and support in furthering the cause in Canada.

This resolution was unanimously adopted, as was also the following:

Believing that a large executiv committee is a source of weakness rather than of strength, therefore be it

Resolved, That the Canadian Secular Union recommend to all its branch societies to appoint not to exceed five of its members to act on its executiv committee, and that when electing them they appoint men in whom they can repose the utmost confidence, and delegate to them full power to transact all the business details of the branch.

These are among the most important measures passed at the convention, and there is no doubt that upon their being successfully carried out depends greatly the future success of our organization.

On Sunday morning the election of officers took place, with the following result: President, Wm. Algie; secretary, J. A. Risser; corresponding secretary, J. Harrison; treasurer, A. Earsman—who, with Messrs. Littlehales and Maddox, of Hamilton, and Strange, Hicks, Piddington, Joplin, and Armstrong, of Toronto, will form the central executiv for the coming year.

Mr. Burnham was present at the Saturday evening and Sunday morning sessions, and rendered valuable assistance. In the evening (Sunday) he lectured to a large audience; subject, "Nature's Reply to Her Critics." It was a grand lecture, and listened to throughout with marked attention. At the conclusion of the lecture President Algie, in dismissing the audience, made a stirring appeal for further support from all who felt an interest in the cause, and in the continuance of the Sunday lectures, which had the effect of bringing in several new subscribers. This was the final meeting of the convention, and after winding up business matters the meeting adjourned until next year, subject to the call of the committee.

So ended the Canadian convention of 1886, and in many respects, including financially, it may be said to hav been fairly successful. It was expected that Mr. Watts would be present, but his engagements in the States prevented his being with us. It is quite probable, however, that he will be here again before the season closes.

Mr. Burnham was induced to remain with us for two weeks after the convention. He lectured last Sunday evening to a large audience, and will complete his engagement next Sunday, after which we expect an interregne of a few weeks in the lecture work. In the mean time the committee are making every effort to carry out the orders of the convention with a view to keeping lecturers in the field continually through the season. KANUCK.

Jefferson Not the Author of the Declaration of Independence.

If Thomas Jefferson had died three years earlier than he did, there would hav been no positiv assertion in any of his writings that he composed the Declaration of Independence. From the time of its adoption until 1823, a period of forty-seven years, he studiously and artfully evaded the claim of its authorship. But at last, in his eighty-first year, he said, "I consented—I wrote it;" and again, two years later, he said, once that he wrote it, and once that he drafted it.

Jefferson's "Summary Views," written in August, 1774, is a document three times longer than the Declaration of Independence. It contains all the grievances of the colonies. These may also be found in numerous documents of the time. The complaints were stereotyped and could be recited by almost everybody. There was little material in most of them for a display of eloquence, and it is a curious fact that in one paragraph of the Declaration of Independence there are eleven of these complaints which agree almost verbatim and consecutivly with the same number of complaints consecutivly in a paper drafted by John Dickinson a year before, and another paper drafted by Jefferson a month later, in 1775. The verbal coincidence of these eleven complaints is remarkable, to wit:

Words of Jefferson agreeing with Dickinson's	61
Words of Jefferson repeated in Declaration of Independence	44
Words in common to the three papers	26

This unanimity, which was almost unavoidable, disposes of the argument presented by "Holt," who has taken great pains to copy a portion of Jefferson's "Summary View" for the purpose of showing that some of it agrees with the Declaration of Independence.

The "Summary View" is the best specimen of Jefferson's composition either before or after 1776, and there are a few passages in it that may be called eloquent. But if the reader will turn to page 236 of "Junius Unmasked," he will see how Jefferson, in the best of his literary essays, to wit, this same "Summary View," violates all the rules of rhetoric. The fact is, he was not a rhetorician, and flights of eloquence in his compositions are as rare as billows on a mill-pond. Hence it is that the finest orator and rhetorician of our time is constrained to say in regard to the Declaration of Independence:

> Certain it is that Jefferson could not hav written anything so manly, so striking, so comprehensiv, so clear, so convincing, so faultless in rhetoric and rhythm.

The eloquent and impressiv passages of the Declaration are unmistakably in the style of Paine. "Decency" and "respect" were favorit words of Paine and of Junius. Look now at the consecutiv occurrence of these two words in the first letter of Junius and the first paragraph of the Declaration:

JUNIUS.	DECLARATION.
Let us enter into it with candor and decency. Respect is due to the station of ministers, etc.	A decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes, etc.

But I will not repeat the many evidences of Paine's authorship. If the reader is not satisfied with what I presented in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 31st, let him examin the proofs in "Junius Unmasked."

The New York World lately printed an interview with a descendant of William Cobbett in reference to the disposition of Thomas Paine's bones. Most of the information obtained was incorrect. The bones were dug up by Cobbett in 1819 and transported by him to England, with the avowed intention of having a funeral there worthy of the remains to be reinterred. But the proper time did not come. The bones passed to Cobbett's son in 1835. Soon afterward they became the subject of litigation; but the chancellor decided that they were not property, and so young Cobbett was allowed to retain them. But they were held by a receiver for many years, and at last, in 1846, he gave them to an old friend of Cobbett senior, for the purpose of fulfilling his wishes. How long that person retained them I do not know, but in February, 1875, I wrote to Mr. M. D. Conway, in London, to find out where the bones then were. He answered:

> We seem not to get along, I regret to say, in the matter of Thomas Paine's bones, owing to the determined silence of the man—one Ainslie, a Unitarian preacher—to whom they were last traced.

My object then was, if possible, to hav the bones returned to New Rochelle, and there placed in a mausoleum. I still hope for such a disposal of the remains—not a reinterment, but an inclosure of the well-preserved skeleton in a glass case for a shrine.

For it was the secret work of Thomas Paine, seconded and supported by Benjamin Franklin, that began and carried through to a successful termination the American Revolution. In other words, Paine and Franklin made this nation.

W. H. BURR.

Spirit Photography.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Having no connection with Mr. Keeler, the medium for spirit-photography, except as an investigator, I desired the appointment of a committee to prove, by scientific methods, its genuinness, under such test conditions "as could leave no possible chance for deception."

The appointment was made, and after considerable delay, partly occasioned by Mr. Keeler's absence from the city and partly owing to his suspicions of Mr. Parkhurst's good faith, and Mr. Parkhurst's suspicions of Mr. Keeler's honesty, meetings were held for purposes of experimentation, the results of which were to be published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, without (as I had urged and hoped) comment on the part of the committee other than would be necessary to show the precautions taken to secure genuin spirit pictures, that thus the reader might be able to reach a just conclusion unaided, and the opportunity for the ventilation of opinions and misrepresentation of facts be avoided.

Your committee having chosen a different course, I am under the necessity—in justice to Mr. Keeler, as well as myself, and the truth of Spiritualism—to point out some of the most glaring inconsistencies and evidences of insincerity with which the report abounds, and which are most painfully apparent to me as an eye-witness, familiar with almost all the details.

To do this somewhat thoroughly, has required much more time and labor than I anticipated, I having felt it necessary to obtain the opinions of photographers, which could only be done during my leisure hours from business.

All will agree with the committee in the statement that "the phenomena, if genuin, could be easily established by incontrovertible tests."

The committee did not, by their own admissions, apply such tests, notwithstanding the challenge distinctly provided for their doing so and my reply to Mr. Parkhurst's criticism of the challenge specially enjoined it upon them, by saying, "Certainly no test will be good for anything which leaves a possible chance for deception." It was their duty to guard all avenues to fraud—to leave neither front nor back doors open.

To their report in detail I therefore make the following objections:

1. To the declaration that the challenge "was explained so as to make it available in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 17th," unless it was liable to be construed as a money-making scheme for the committee, without an explanation.

2. To the declaration that "the committee was immediately appointed and accepted," not having been notified of the fact until May 11th following.

3. To the declaration that "the committee wished to aid the spirits in either making an impression upon a photographic plate, or establishing the verity of the results," the intended sarcasm losing its force in the effort to detect fraud by turning the plate when putting it in the holder with the transparency, when pictures Nos. 7 and 9 were obtained.

4. To the allusion to Mr. Keeler's letter to me of June 11th, it having been agreed between Mr. Parkhurst and myself that no allusion to it should be made, owing to Mr. Keeler's withdrawal of all conditions therein named, of which fact Mr. Parkhurst had been personally notified by me before the sessions began.

5. To the representation that Mr. Keeler had "around him such friends as he chose to invite," because it conveys the idea of many, when, in fact, Mr. Keeler had invited none. Only such Spiritualists were present as I had invited. At the first session, one; at the second, two; and at the third, three, two of whom were not "friends of Mr. Keeler's."

6. To all statements of conversations between Mr. Parkhurst and myself days and weeks previous to the sessions, because, as published, they convey wrong impressions to the mind of the reader.

7. To the reason given for "deciding to giv every opportunity for the production of negativs, whether by genuin or fraudulent means," as such a course was directly contrary to the express provisions of the challenge, and I was not notified of such decision so expressed.

8. To the reference to Mr. Keeler's "manifest reluctance to enter upon the investigation," because it is equivalent to charging him with fear of being detected in fraud, and obliges me to state the true reason, which was the conscious knowledge with which Mr. Keeler seemed possessed, that Mr. Parkhurst would not do him justice under any circumstances. Also because it implies that at the preceding sessions, Mr. Keeler failed "to cheerfully and unhesitatingly comply" with conditions, or would hav done so, had any been proposed.

9. To the statement that the second meeting was restricted to two members "in accordance with conditions imposed by Mr. Keeler," because, if the conditions named in the letter are those referred to, they had been withdrawn.

10. To the statement that "the committee were not invited to impose, and did not, any test conditions" at this session, as they evidently did not desire, and probably were not prepared, to do so.

11. To the statement "that it was not the object to detect jugglers' tricks in a process allowing so much room for legerdemain," its insincerity being made manifest by Mr. Parkhurst twice turning a plate several times, in order (as he himself declares) to cause the alleged previously printed face to appear inverted. Also because, had Mr. Parkhurst placed the original package of plates I had purchased for the occasion (and brought with me and offered him) in the possession and charge of Dr. Leigh—the only other member of the committee present at this the most important session—instead of telling us that "he did not care about the plates now, as he had his tests and intended to rely entirely upon them," there would hav been absolutely no room for the practice of legerdemain, nor any opportunity for the committee to refer to an "open back door."

12. To the declaration that the explanation made to me was sufficient to explain the reason for the appearance of the additional face produced at the first session, and that it also applied and accounted for those appearing at the second session, because no proof is offered, and Mr. Parkhurst fails to state what that reason was, in connection with the remark itself, leaving the reader to infer that with such reason I must hav been satisfied.

13. To the comparison of expedition with which pictures are taken in an ordinary photographic gallery, because creating the impression that Mr. Keeler required time to perform his feats of legerdemain, when the facts are, the time was taken up in examining and discussing the results.

14. To the statement that "we had been invited to leave the room, to see if they could not be more successful," because, without explanation, the reader will infer the committee went out of the room, which is not correct, nor was it intended.

15. To the statement that "every one of the twenty-five negativs taken during the three sessions could evidently hav been produced under similar conditions by members of the committee," because it is an empty boast.

16. To the statement: "The total number of successful negativs under complete test conditions, 0," as it implies that efforts made to get pictures under "complete test conditions" resulted in failures because of such conditions, which is not true, unless pictures 3, 7, and 9 be regarded as having been obtained under "complete test conditions." None of the failures occurred under any more "complete test conditions" than the successes.

17. To the statement that the negativ submitted for inspection which showed the slide partially drawn had a spirit face, "which was manifestly printed by the simultaneous process," because the picture itself "manifestly" contradicts it, for the reason that the dress of the spirit, buttoning much below the waist, is "manifestly" behind the chair-back, and the end of the lace or lawn tie of an overdress is "manifestly" partly in front of the sitter's right shoulder.

18. To the statement that "the extraneous face wholly of plus deposit, indicating previous printing, . . . was too vague to show whether it was intercepted by the handkerchief or not," because other expert photographers to whom I hav shown this plate do not concur in the statement that it is "too vague to show," but on the contrary, say it does very distinctly show that "it is intercepted by the handkerchief," the same being the proof against previous printing, which is the charge brought against the genuinness of all the pictures taken at this session.

19. To the positiv statement that "in the five opportunities for spirits to manifest themselvs under complete test conditions, there was nothing upon the plate additional to the sitter," for the reason that, as before stated, none of the plates were exposed under "complete test conditions." Also for the reason that, had any extraneous faces appeared, the same objection to their genuinness could hav been urged (and no doubt would hav been) with as much propriety as it is urged against the genuinness of those appearing, when Mr. Parkhurst tried so hard, but unsuccessfully, to detect fraud, namely: The committee did not keep the plates in their possession all the time and, therefore, could not know they had not been tampered with.

It is certainly remarkable how positiv the committee can be of the fairness of the results when no extraneous faces appear, and yet declare with equal positivness to evidences of fraud when they do; the completeness of the tests in each case being the same, and the session under their management.

20. To the glaring omission to notice, when alluding to the cane picture, the remarkable fact, that, where the cane crosses the neck and drapery of the spirit form, covering the space between the left shoulder of the sitter and the center of the chin of the spirit's face, it is not obscured in the least, whilst making the statement that "it is partially obscured in passing across the face." It is not correct to say

"the cane crosses directly over a spirit face evidently produced in the camera."

The more correct statement is this: So much of a genuin spirit was photographed as the head, face, neck, and right and left shoulder. Her neck was so stretched forward as to advance her face beyond a point which, had she not been a spirit, it could not hav passed, because of the cane in the way.

Having reached beyond that point, her picture was photographed with this result: Her darkly-shaded right shoulder, and the light and dark folds of her spirit drapery, being behind the cane, were obscured by the cane, but so much of the face, head, and spirit drapery as had been advanced in front of the cane, were not obscured by it. The mouth, left nostril, left eyebrow, and front hair, and vaguely, the spirit drapery, etc., above it, even to the end of the cane, show as if through, or on, or over, the cane, and very properly so.

This picture and the one with the slide partially drawn (and which I challenge any member of the committee to duplicate) completely upset Mr. Parkhurst's and the committee's theory of both previous and simultaneous printing.

The reader will please observe that neither of these pictures was taken in the presence of the committee. The "cane picture" was unexpectedly sprung upon Mr. Keeler by myself, as a test, before the sessions commenced, and the "slide picture" the morning of the day following the last session; a gentleman happening to drop in for the purpose of getting a picture, the opportunity was embraced to try the experiment.

As, however, Mr. Parkhurst so utterly failed to catch Mr. Keeler in fraud, he was driven to the expedient of pretending to determin by the negativs themselvs the cause of the existence of extraneous faces upon them. He could not, therefore, consistently refuse to pass upon these, and he having done so, it is legitimate for me to make use of them to show the insufficiency of this last resort to disprove the genuinness of spirit-photography.

They are both complete refutations of the "simultaneous process," and bear none of the marks he alludes to of "previous printing."

The declaration that "genuin results would follow some rule," when referring to the lighting of spirit faces, "sometimes corresponding to the sitter's face and sometimes not," is a fair presumption, but it was hardly to be expected that the committee would be able to determin the rule in so short a time.

But the declaration that "no two original negativs can be alike" is simply ridiculous. Also the reason given, as follows: "As it is too much trouble to prepare transparencies to use them but once," therefore, "if some of the spirit faces could be published and widely circulated, perhaps the duplicates could be found," proves nothing except the crude ideas the committee seem to entertain of the powers of spirits; implying a belief on the part of the committee that, if spirits could manifest in this manner at all, they could only do it once, and for only one person—a very stupid belief.

Neither does the objection to trying the stereoscope appear clearly. The reason given is that "Mr. Keeler had had a month's trial [which, by the way, is also an error], and in that time he might just as easily produce a stereoscopic picture as other kinds."

But he had been taking the other kinds several years! Wouldn't Mr. Parkhurst hav had a much better chance to detect the alleged fraud with the stereoscope? On the other hand, if it was not fraud he was seeking, why would not stereoscopic pictures hav been just as valuable to demonstrate the truth of spirit-photography, although Mr. Keeler had only a month's practice in getting them?

The statement Mr. Parkhurst makes as follows, "I developed the plate myself, carefully searching before the development for a positiv in the plate-holder," givs the whole thing "dead away." Why search for a positiv or transparency in the plate-holder when all the pictures obtained at this session are said to hav been produced by previous printing, for the reason "that it was much the safer method?" The handkerchief picture had been obtained before this, and Mr. Parkhurst had examined the negativ.

The extraneous face of plus deposit on the handkerchief surely did not need, to the skilled photographer, such additional evidence in corroboration as the searching of the plate-holder for a transparency.

Is it not rather evident by this admission that at this stage of the proceedings he really did not know how the pictures were being produced?

Persons who bear testimony against the truth, because of a wilful desire to hav it otherwise, are often liable to entrap themselvs.

The statement in reference to the picture with the hand on the head, the hand being in "an ungraceful position," is also singularly at variance with the opinions of at least ninety-nine per cent of other critics. And why "the whole value of the test consisted in the production of the result without any opportunity for previous preparation" when the committee chose to rely "entirely upon an examination of the negativs," is not very clear to ordinary comprehension, whether the hand occupied a graceful or an ungraceful position.

The reader should know that the negativ noticed by the report as bearing entirely different characteristics, and which "forcibly suggests the consideration that a genuin spirit form would be almost certain to hav these same decisiv characteristics separating it absolutely from the characteristics of plus and minus printing already described," was taken—as I am informed, on good authority—in a dark room, at a so-called materialization, and therefore under very different conditions. Thus, be it observed that, while denying the possibility of spirit-photography (which is the apparent intention of the report), the committee nevertheless attempt to describe the characteristics a genuin spirit-picture should possess.

As well swear to the genuinness of a signature they never saw written.

Now, Mr. Editor, my "reply to the challenge criticism" was made "available" by me to qualify the class of persons I desired to convince of the genuinness of spirit-photography, to wit, "reasonably skeptical persons," not such as would rely "mainly upon examination of the negativs themselvs for internal evidence as to their origin," not knowing what that evidence should be.

The committee hav attempted to pass judgment upon the negativs as experts. As regards the value of "expert" testimony, your readers will, no doubt, pardon me for narrating the following testimony of Mr. Grinnell, a prominent lawyer of Chicago:

> The expert witness belongs to a class apart. Although he is sworn to tell the truth, and nothing but the truth, he is usually paid by the side that calls him, and his testimony takes the bias of that side. He givs his opinion upon scientific matters that the jury is supposed to be unable to comprehend without it. Our experience is, it is remarkably easy to get just as many opinions on one side as on the other, if the money holds out. I do not mean such witnesses are corrupt or perjurers—far from it. Scientific and learned men will do simply what all lawyers do—support to the best of their ability the side that retains them. Opinions on hand-writing are the most fallacious in the world, and yet we are constantly calling witnesses to giv opinions on it. A very striking instance of this occurred some years ago in New York city. John J. Cisco, for many years sub-treasurer of the United States, a man of the highest character, testified very positivly to the signature to a check. A large sum of money was depending, and Mr. Cisco's evidence was very damaging to the other side. Judge Pierrepont, afterwards Grant's minister to England, cross-examined him, and failed to shake his opinion. Pierrepont had the check in his hand, and carelessly dropped it into his hat on the table, and examined the witness for a moment on some other matter. Then, apparently taking the check from his hat again, he presented it to the witness, and made him giv the grounds of his opinion, examining the check more closely than ever. Cisco maintained still more positivly that the check was signed by the defendant. "Then," said the counsel, turning to his hat, and producing another check, "who was this signed by?" It was the original check. The one that Pierrepont had cross-examined on was a deft counterfeit, written at the table they were at, by a clerk, during the examination. Needless to say, Mr. Cisco was overwhelmed with mortification, and his testimony rendered valueless.

Now, Mr. Editor, Mr. Parkhurst had declared to me in advance that even though one of his own relativs appeared upon a plate that he could recognize, "he would not believe, unless it proved to be a particular one." Also, when expostulating with him for pursuing truth with a club, he replied that "he did not intend to let the boost my challenge had given Spiritualism stand any longer than he could help." If, therefore, as Mr. Grinnell declares, "scientific and learned men will do simply what all lawyers do—support to the best of their ability the side that retains them," such remarks, indicating strong prejudice, calculated to bias the mind of the experts (?), in this case, would cause them to do the same. And if it is so easy to be mistaken as to the genuinness of a signature with which the expert was perfectly familiar, how presumptuous the testimony of your committee, biased as their minds are proven to be by their report itself, upon the subject under consideration! Its audacity is also surprising in view of the fact that I hav in my possession the pictures and negativs which disprove their assertions.

I believe it will be seen, by reading their report and this reply to it, that their verdict is, "The whole experiment a failure because of fraud." As they were particularly requested to prevent all opportunities for fraud, who is responsible for failure, if such it is, even from their point of view?

It would also appear that their decision was made beforehand, and they purposely permitted an opening for fraud, so that in case it was a success they would not be compelled to admit it.

The report is signed by Prof. H. M. Parkhurst, secretary; Drs. E. B. Foote, Jr., and Edwin Leigh, and Mr. O. G. Mason.

Of these gentlemen Professor Parkhurst and Dr. Leigh were present at two sessions; Dr. Foote and Mr. Mason at but one, at neither of which Mr. Parkhurst's tests were applied.

They all signed the report of things that occurred while some of them were absent.

"Hearsay evidence" is not admitted in law.

A True Estimate of the Bible.

I brand the Bible as a gigantic fraud from beginning to end, not saying, however, that there were no such places, and many such actors and acts, as therein mentioned, but that tradition, superstition, imagination, vanity, Jewish egotism, etc., hav magnified the mole-hill into a mountain, upon which credulity has reared its castle, and fortified itself against the attack of reason.

I can see the poet, the novelist, the caricaturist, in the background of this "holy word," but I fail to see the molding, fashioning hand of the conscientious historian or moralist, or the "finger" of an almighty, all-merciful God.

I can see the trio join hands in the garden of Eden, part company amid the confusion at the tower of Babel, meet again at the door of Abraham's tent, and the poet tarry with Abraham while the other two journey on to the poet's doomed city, Sodom. I can see them singly, and by twos and threes, alternately appearing and disappearing all through the "blessed Bible," while superstition flaunts her blood-stained flag in the face of reason, and credulity claps her hands and sings praises to the God of the Jews.

The poet, in imagination, soars among the stars in heaven's blue dome, or penetrates the earth's center, bringing to light the hidden things thereof. He adds luster to the colors of the rainbow; paints in silvery folds the waves of the sea; scales the highest mountains; clothes their ragged, barren peaks with verdure and beauty, and sinks to the fiery depths of the volcano, uttering the shrieks and heart-rending groans of the Bible's damned. The poet generally keeps in view the "eternal fitness of things," and givs to the good and pure the exalted, dazzling thrones of joy and bliss among the glittering stars, while he consigns the obnoxious, gross, impure, detestable things of land and sea to the eruptiv volcanic depths, beside which Vesuvius is but a mere bubble.

He leads us along the gilded pathway of life, or journeys with us to the gloomy, silent tomb.

He sees that beauty, joy, and happiness abound under certain conditions; also that misery, sorrow, and woe prevail under opposit conditions. Whatever tends to increase, or simply perpetuate, the former he extols, and that which produces the latter he condemns.

The good (often purely imaginary) in the poet's idol is always described in glowing terms. The evil produced by it is rarely discerned by him, and even then is sometimes excused, or else screened altogether. A David may be the poet's theme. If so, there are none to be compared to him. He sees only the good and not the evil of David's nature. A Goliath, defending his country and people, may attract the poet's attention. If so, there are none so tall, so bold, and so warlike as he, until the half-breed poet comes upon the scene and describes the "stripling" David, with his sling and pebbles, in the act of smiting and conquering the giant of fable. The contrast in stature, armor, bearing, etc., is too great. David must be made equal, yea, even superior, to Goliath, and the imagination again plays its part and brings to view another actor—God.

An Aaron may hav existed in fact; yet if he did not, imagination could hav supplied an actor and called him Aaron. His rod may hav appeared like a serpent to King Pharaoh; but if it did not, fable could hav given the rod its life and serpent form as easily as put language in the serpent's mouth, or giv the fox the power of speech to address the elephant.

There is not the slightest reason to doubt the existence of the Jews, or that they hav a history—everybody and everything has that—and no doubt they warred with and sometimes conquered other nations, but there is good reason to doubt that they conquered by supreme aid, for there had been people of poetic temperament in the land previous to this period who saw the evidence of changes having taken place by agencies unknown to them, and, having been ignorant of the law of gravity, of geology, of astronomy, and science in general, naturally drifted into a belief in a supreme ruler, a God of war, who meddled with their commonest affairs, and often turned a seeming defeat into the grandest victory. And perhaps they had an idea of a "natural standard of right," yet when their self-accusing consciences upbraided them on account of wrong-doing, they ignored the promptings of this conscience and looked past it to their imaginary God and regarded him as being the author of their disquietude and unrest. Then when engaged in battle and overcome by their enemies, they concluded that their God was fighting on the other side because of Jewish sins. Such was their education that they could see God in the rainbow and in the rain-drop; in the lightning's flash and the thunder's roar; in the luxuriant vegetation; in flocks and herds; in famin and pestilence; in the earthquake, the avalanche, the gentle breeze, the devastating whirlwind, the rushing of the mighty rivers, the babbling of the tiny brooks. In all things, great and small, in heaven and earth, was the God of the Jews manifest, but no other. W. S. ALLISON.

A Kindly Warning.

The Universalists claim that God is too good to damn anybody. The Unitarians claim that everybody is too good to be damned. The Evangelicals hold that God is not too good to damn a very large proportion of the world, and that that proportion is in every way worthy of being damned. They believe, with Paul, that "there is none righteous, no, not one: There is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God. They are all gone out of the way, they are altogether become unprofitable; there is none that doeth good, no, not one. Their throat is an open sepulcher; with their tongues they hav used deceit; the poison of asps is under their lips." Sin and misery, say the Evangelicals, exist under God's government, and therefore cannot be inconsistent with his attributes.

Nowadays, when a Christian is asked if he believes in the everlasting punishment of those who do not accept the supernatural character of Christ, he will either answer No, or qualify his hell by the revised version, or future probation, or refuse to reply. There is no doubt that the majority of Christians (civilized Christians, we mean, not the New Jersey variety) hav outgrown the horrible doctrin of a hell for unbelievers. But this growth in goodness is a direct growth from grace, and a falling away from the teachings of Christ, who threatened a literal damnation for those who disbelieved on him. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned." "He that believeth on the son hath life, and he that believeth not the son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him."

Jesus taught a literal hell also in the story of a "certain rich man" who died, "and in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torments." Jesus told the unbelieving Jews that they were the children of the devil—and he ought to be good authority on devils and their residences. Again: "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?" In upbraiding the unthankfulness and impenitence of Capernaum, Jesus said, "And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell." Describing the last judgment, Christ says of those who did not minister to him, "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment." Of those who blaspheme against the "Holy Ghost" Jesus prophesies that they are "in danger of eternal damnation."

If Jesus had not believed that there was a literal, burning hell, would he hav said these things? Or, rather, if those who builded the scheme of salvation upon an alleged Christ had not intended to introduce an eternal prison of torture, would they hav written these threats?

That Paul accepted the doctrin of hell there is no doubt. "If we sin wilfully," he says, "after that we hav received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation which shall devour the adversaries." In 2 Peter iii, 7, we read again, "But the heavens and the earth, which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." Paul and Peter certainly taught the doctrin of a hell. In Jude, the condition of the angels who left their "first estate" is described. Them God "hath reserved in everlasting chains, under darkness, unto judgment of the great day. Even as Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities about them, in like manner, giving themselvs over to fornication, and going after strange flesh, are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire." Evidently Jude was a Presbyterian. St. John, the divine, was also an Evangelical. The fearful and the unbelieving, he says, together with some others, who, from the description given, must hav been Christians, "shall hav their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone; which is the second death." And, for the benefit of those Christians who are too kind-hearted to believe in hell, St. John adds: "And if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city."

It is greatly to the credit of Christians that they no longer accept the New Testament on this point. Most of them hav long since abandoned the Old Testament as a geological text-book, and if they are now slowly yielding the New as an infallible guide to the other world, let us not cast too many stones at them. As a history, the New Testament is fallacious. Written nearly two hundred years after the alleged events are said to hav occurred, it is not a matter for wonder that inaccuracies are contained therein. The wonder is that men can be found who ever believed it fully. But if the promises of punishments made by Jesus are not true, how can we be sure that the promises of rewards are genuin? A more infamous doctrin than that of a hell was never conceived; a more childish one than that of heaven never amused a nursery. However, both doctrins rest upon the same authority, and if one goes so must the other. There is nothing more distinct in the New Testament than the thunders of punishment for unbelievers in Christ. Against the doubters of his divine mission Jesus hurled his most terrible threats. He was in earnest upon that subject if upon any. And if the New Testament is to be believed at all, those Christians who refuse to believe what he said will meet the fate of the wicked, and be turned into hell along with those nations that forget God. It is a fearful prospect.

The Latest From Rome.

Some late decrees of Mr. Pecci, pope, are of more than passing interest to the people of the United States, since it is here that Rome will make her last stand among civilized nations.

It is known to those who follow the sinuous machinations of the Romish church that the Jesuits form the retrogressiv party within the church. Of late years, owing to their outrageous acts, the pope has deemed it unwise to countenance them, and they hav been partially deprived of power. A curious story—but a story by no means surprising—now comes from Rome that it is to the Jesuits that Leo XIII. owes his recent intestinal disturbance. The general belief of the people of Italy is that the Jesuits administered poison to the pope, and that a change of his policy toward them was the price paid for the medical services that placed him out of danger.

Be this as it may, the fact remains that the pope has changed his policy toward the Jesuits, and toward the rest of the world. Within three days of the recovery from his illness, the pope issued a bull reëstablishing all the privileges, immunities, exceptions, and indulgences formerly accorded to the "Society of Jesus," and declaring null and void all documents which his predecessors hav ever written against the order. This bull was quickly followed by an order from Cardinal Monaco, of the Holy Inquisition, prohibiting all Roman Catholics in Italy from taking any part in the elections or politics of the country. A few days later a further papal decree was issued, prohibiting the judges in all Roman Catholic countries from pronouncing sentences of divorce, or from putting them into execution. One particular sentence in the decree covers a far wider ground than the mere question of the unbinding of nuptial ties. It runs as follows: "The judicial functionaries must refuse obedience to the state, and to the laws of the country which are in contradiction with Roman Catholic precepts." A few days ago the pope sent out secret circulars to all the bishops, ordering them to instruct their priests that no Roman Catholic parent should send his child to the government or communal schools.

This last decree, says the writer from Rome who sends this to the New York Tribune, means civil war in Italy. The order prohibiting Italian Catholics from taking part in the elections or politics of their country, says one of the leading Catholic Italian journals, is a death-blow to all hopes of a reconciliation between church and state, and can but result in disaster to the church.

This disaster to the political aims of the church no patriotic citizen of the United States will regret. But what is of more—of the utmost—consequence is the order of the pope to Catholic functionaries to refuse obedience to the state and to the laws of the country which are in contradiction with Roman Catholic precepts. The Catholic church has a way of issuing a general order applicable to only a section of her spiritual jurisdiction. This was the course pursued against the Knights of Labor. The edict against secret societies is general, but is applied only to Canada in the case of the Knights. Probably we shall be told that the order of the pope to judicial officers applies only to Italy, and that we in the United States are safe. But how shall we know that? Was there ever a sincere Catholic who was not at heart a traitor to the country in which he livs so long as he pays his highest allegiance to the pope? A Catholic may be to all outward appearance a good and patriotic citizen, but if the contest came between his church and his country would he not remain firm to the former and fight against the latter? This order of the pope is open rebellion on its face, and who knows that Catholic officials will not secretly obey it, even in the United States! The church is an organization of enormous influence, and the fact that the pope feels strong enough to openly assist the Jesuits, and defy the Italian government, indicates that he has a reserve force to fall back upon. And in what other country is he so strong as in the United States?

We hav but little hope that, so long as Roman Catholics hav votes in New York, so long as the Protestants are content to share with Catholics in the spoils from our state treasury, and so long as New York is the pivotal state in the presidential elections, anything will be done to check the colossal power of Rome. One of these days there will be a civil war between ignorance and education; between faith and freedom; between the public and parochial school systems; between Secularism and Catholicism, and then the matter will be definitly settled—and probably settled in blood. A little common honesty on the part of the Protestants would obviate this civil war, but it is too much to expect that they will show it.

"Infidels in Old Age."

Under this heading the Christian Advocate of the 23d ult. attempts to set forth the earthly end of "open, positiv unbelievers and opponents of the Bible!" We cannot conceive where Mr. Buckley got the data from which he reasons, for we would not, at this time, accuse him of wilful lying, though we once heard a Pennsylvania judge, who knew Mr. Buckley intimately when young, say he had the reputation of being the most gifted heterophemist of the Methodist church. We are charitable enough to hope that since then our doctor of divinity has reformed. But where, we ask, did he get his authority for saying this of Infidels:

"Very often, as they grow old, they become desperate and almost fiendish in their bitterness. Their conversation becomes blasphemous; a sardonic expression settles upon their features. A jaundiced state of mind, which rejoices in hearing evil of Christians and telling it, characterizes them. In other cases an almost diabolical ingenuity in perverting words of scripture is developed. To perpetrate puns and witticisms upon the most holy things, including the atonement of our Lord and his dying words, is their delight. This was the condition of Le Roy Sunderland's mind, and from his once brilliant pen came some most fearful and blasphemous doggerel. Often they decline in morality, and the external conformity to ordinary moral principles on which they hav based their professions of genuin morality is proved to hav been a 'whited sepulcher,' or, if it were genuin, is renounced. Their associations become low, and not a few instances hav been seen of such men becoming drunkards and the companions of fools in their old age. Having no habits of piety to restrain them, no principles, and no religious faith to cheer them as animal spirits giv place to exhaustion, lassitude, and pain, and as the future is without a ray of light, and the influence of early religious instruction begins to make itself felt, 'a thousand stings within their breasts deprive their souls of ease.' In such a case, that they should seek oblivion in the use of alcoholic stimulants and narcotics is not wonderful."

For over a decade our daily companions hav been Infidels, but we cannot recollect that the foregoing description fits any of them. On the other hand, as Infidels grow old in their religion of doing good, their character becomes so fixed, their convictions so tenacious, that they care less to engage in the aggressiv war upon creeds. A young Infidel is enthusiastic, earnest, aggressiv, sometimes rough in his onslaught upon Christianity. The aged Infidel is a man at peace with his own mind and with the world. He, if anyone, enjoys that "peace which passeth all understanding." The progress of the world satisfies him; he sees in evolution the force which, on the whole, makes for righteousness, regardless of the temporary disappointments. He has an abiding faith in humanity, and is content that the world is better when he leaves than when he enters it. Death, to him, is but a disintegration of atoms, a lying down to sleep, perchance to pleasant dreams. There is no occasion for him to be jaundiced, "blasphemous," or sardonic. And instead of deteriorating in morality, the fact is that those Freethinkers are about the "straitest-laced" folks we know. Even the cheering cigar is condemned as an immoral agent, and a large proportion of Liberals are Prohibitionists. Their habits of piety having long since given place to habits of common sense, their lives are prolonged; having no fear of burning hells and angry Gods, their last days are cheerful; as physical strength departs mental calmness and philosophical resignation ensue, and they meet without complaining the inevitable end decreed by natural law for all living organisms. We never knew of an Infidel with a thousand stings within his breast that deprived his soul of ease, and it is extremely rare that one resorts to stimulants and narcotics. At least, this is our experience; and though we hav not lived as many years in this world as has the editor of the Advocate, we think our acquaintance with Infidels is quite as extensiv.

There are, however, other phases of the Infidel character in old age, says the Methodist sermonizer:

"A large number in the aggregate renounce their Infidelity and become humble, God-fearing men. Scarcely any great revival occurs in any denomination that several such do not appear and become earnest Christians. The Roman Catholics are constantly receiving such into their communion. some of whom had been subject to their influence in childhood, and others hav been brought within their influence by domestic and social forces.

"We subjoin a letter recently read in the churches of a New England town under the following circumstances: The letter was written by a well-known local Infidel, 'the best read man in that section of the state,' who had always gloried in being called an Infidel, and has been among those who most bitterly opposed the church and Christianity—in fact, he was their leader for years. He now thinks that he has sinned beyond the hope of forgivness, but declares his intention of spending his few remaining days in endeavoring to counteract the evil influence he has started.

"The following is the letter, which has been placed in our hands by the person who, at the request of the Infidel, read it to the public:

"'My dear friends and neighbors, hear what an old man has to say. I hav been considered an Infidel, which I hav not denied. I wish here to declare that I am convinced that I hav been fighting against the truth as written in the word of God.

"'I desire now to counteract the evil that I may hav caused. I believe for a person to liv and die happily he must believe in the Lord Jesus Christ as recorded in the scriptures.

"'My advice to all is, Search for the truth, and pray God to guide you. I pray God day and night to hav mercy and forgiv my sins, which are many, for Jesus Christ's sake. I ask the prayers of all who hav faith in God.'

"It may be concluded that, with comparativly few exceptions, all such whose days are prolonged will either exhibit the natural consequences of being 'without God and without hope in the world' in depraved lives or in a misanthropic and abnormal spirit, or will turn from their unbelief to him who hath the words of eternal life."

Now, these, we submit, are general statements which to be believed need corroborativ testimony. We call for names, dates, places. It won't do to say that a certain man in a certain town sent a letter to a certain church asking for prayers. One swallow does not make a summer, especially when that swallow has been seen only in the mind's eye. The trail of the serpent is too plain in this letter for it to hav emanated from a well-read Infidel. The writer has the cant of the prayer-meeting too pat, and the letter reads as though written to order. Before we can allow that a large number of Infidels renounce their principles, we must hav proof of some one instance of the kind. The misinformation written around this alleged letter of an alleged Infidel is not the kind of evidence that convinces.

Law and Love in Kansas.

E. C. Walker is in sore trouble. On the 19th of September he entered into a marriage contract with Miss Lillian Harman, daughter of the senior editor of Lucifer. Mr. Walker has been previously married, but recently procured a divorce. His first wife and his children are now living in Melior, Barber county, Kansas. The Kansas City Times reports that his contract with Lillian Harman was witnessed by the friends of both parties, Mr. Harman himself performing such ceremony as was deemed necessary. On September 20th E. C. Walker and Lillian Harman were complained against by the state of Kansas because they "did then and there unlawfully and feloniously liv together as man and wife, without being or having been married, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state of Kansas." Bonds were fixed at one thousand dollars. September 22d Mr. Walker writes us:

"CELL 2, THE JAIL, OSKALOOSA, KAN.

"We were brought here yesterday, having failed to procure bail. We succeeded in getting Lillian released, the officers being better than the law. I remain till October 27th, when our preliminary examination comes on. If held, which is probable, shall hav to come back if bondsmen cannot be found. We very much need money to meet the expenses already accumulating, and appeal to the Liberals everywhere."

Mr. Walker's address is still at Valley Falls, where the Harman family reside. We are informed by private correspondence, and by the public press of the vicinity, that there are other moral questions involved in this matter. Mr. Walker's, Miss Harman's, and the ex-Mrs. Walker's private affairs are no business of the public, but if the public is to be appealed to full information should be given.

Editorial Notes.

GEORGE E. MACDONALD, whose contributions to THE TRUTH SEEKER are widely copied and read, is sojourning in Maine, called thither by family matters. Some observations made on his journey are interesting as records of fact. He says: "Traveling was weary, lonesome business. The tedium was somewhat relieved upon entering this state by the numerousness of persons in an advanced stage of hilarity. The first 'drunk' I saw was just inside the confines of Maine. The last I saw of him he was sound asleep under three seats in the smoking-car. Bottles were seen often, and were frequently referred to by male passengers. I counted fifteen bottles in one car. A dozen men were half drunk. Never saw anything like it."

THE Greek Catholic church is the "original Jacobs" of Christianity. All the early "fathers" were Greek Catholics. Those "fathers" are up in heaven now, and their patient souls will be pained when they see the last issue of the Methodist organ of this city, which says:

"It will go harder with the missionaries in Bulgaria under such Christian domination as Russia offers than under Moslem. Under Ottoman rule 'a quasi toleration was a national policy. . . . Order was kept between Christians of different religions by officials whom each looked upon as heathens.' Planting missions in Bulgaria has been like attempting to erect piers upon the shifting sands of the Mississippi river."

This is the most unkind cut of all. Abusing a man's grandmother is nothing to it. But the cruelest thing is that it is true. Mohammedans hav a keener sense of justice than Christians.

SINCE the Hempstead, L. I., Freethought Society has been in existence, a local paper, the East Norwich Enterprise, has printed several articles written for that paper by the leaders of the society. So-called replies to these articles hav also been printed. These "replies" hav been furnished by the local clergy. The Suffolk Bulletin, a local contemporary of the Enterprise, thus comments upon the two classes of communications: "There is a marked difference in the style adopted by the two sides, and the coarse, vituperativ method pursued by the ministers in attacking the Hempstead society is in strong contrast with the calm and philosophical reasoning of the latter. We would like to suggest to the ministers who attack this Hempstead society that they will better honor the cause they champion by either keeping silent or avoiding the use of hard names and vile epithets. These are the instruments used by the ignorant, the fanatical, and the depraved, and do not become ministers of the gospel of Jesus."

EDITOR MONROE of the Ironclad Age is in a tantrum about Shakspere. He says:

"Since there are people liable to be misled by the crooked work of the crazy idiots and unscrupulous scoundrels (for only scoundrels could be guilty of the infamous acts) who, in the hope of obtaining a little cheap notoriety, are from time to time coming to the front with startling discoveries, such as 'Shakspere couldn't Write,' 'Evidence that Bacon Wrote the Poems,' 'A Cipher Running Through the Dramas, Proving Conclusivly that Bacon was the Author,' etc., it is meet to inquire what sort of a man this Bacon really was."

And then the irate editor proceeds to rake up from obsolete biographies all the calumnies that hav been heaped upon Bacon, but which hav been completely exploded by the recent biographers, Messrs. Spedding and Dixon. In charac terizing such men as Messrs. Burr and Donnelly as "crazy idiots and unscrupulous scoundrels," Dr. Monroe seems to hav lost his own reason, or had an unusually severe attack of dyspepsia. Both gentlemen are certainly his equals in scholarship and honesty of purpose.

A CHINESE scholar is sojourning in England, according to the papers, and industriously comparing Chinese with European civilization. In contrasting the treatment of women in the different continents, he divulges the following concerning the women of China: "From the day of her marriage the wife becomes her husband's equal; she can sign all documents in the name of the family; can buy and sell property; and giv her children in marriage. In fact, she possesses, with only one exception, just the same civil rights as her husband. Moreover, any honor conferred on the latter is shared equally by her, and she is even entitled to wear the insignia of his rank. Women, however, cannot inherit money; no dowries are given, and hence that curse of European civilization, namely, a money marriage, never occurs in China. Old bachelors and elderly spinsters are almost unknown. Celibacy is looked upon by us as a crime, and contrary to the customs and habits of the country. Marriage takes place at a very early age—boys of sixteen marrying girls of fourteen. The climate has nothing whatsoever to do with this precocity, for it is just as customary in the most northern latitudes as in the tropics. It is rather due to the desire of the parents that their children should be settled early in life, and should devote their strength and the resources of their youth to the family, rather than lead a wild and immoral life away from home. The wife is chosen by the parents of the bridegroom, who does not himself see his intended wife until the day of marriage."

IT is learned from the Oakland County Advertiser, published at Holly, Mich., that the doors of the Methodist Episcopal church at that place are temporarily closed, and that the pastor the Rev. Henry Cartledge, is taking a vacation. The Advertiser further makes it clear that the reverend gentleman's agility in getting out of town saved him from a coat of tar and feathers at the hands of "a justly indignant crowd." The victims of this rascal were young girls, "even those who were sent to his house and church on errands." The editor of the Advertiser thus reflects upon the matter:

"There were some grown persons that knew of the circumstances, but dare not make it public, for the reverend was a great favorit and hard worker, and had done more for the church than any minister they had had for a long time. What must hav been the feelings of those who knew of the facts as they sat in the church Sunday mornings and listened to the base hypocrit, as he stood behind the pulpit, pointing out the straight and narrow path that led to the bright forever, while he, by his brutal conduct, was trying to steal the crown of innocence, woman's virtue, from those little children, leaving in place shame, disgrace, agony, broken hearts, and often the death of the unfortunate victims themselvs? It was a very fortunate thing for the hypocrit and liar that he left just as he did, for he would hav been tarred and feathered and ridden out of town on a rail. Some of his friends gave him warning, and he skipped by the light of the moon. When the matter was known he should hav been arrested, and placed in jail, and had a trial. If it had been a tramp or anyone else, he would hav beeu mobbed and sent to prison, but a preacher is sacred in the eyes of the church, and no matter what they do they will be shielded, and when it gets too hot will be spirited away. The crime, as we look at it, seems greater committed by a minister than by a tramp, for the former is licensed to preach the gospel and administer the Lord's supper, and when they disgrace the cloth and are lost to all decency and shame, as Cartledge was, they should be kicked out of the church and severely punished. After it was ascertained the sacrilegious sneak had gone, he was hung in effigy by a rope stretched across Main street from the house-tops, and was not taken down until 8 o'clock the next morning. If he should ever appear here again it would be the worse for him."

We make no apology for reprinting the foregoing account and other accounts of clerical rascalities. The apology would be called for if the accounts were not published, and people warned against these religious idlers, whom custom has granted privileges such as no other men hav, and which no man ought to hav. These privileges there are always plenty of reprobates to take advantage of. The pastoral system is mainly at fault, and should be abolished in the interest of morality. It is too often discovered that parsons who come to pray remain to prey.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE lectures by S. P. Putnam, at Zeigler Hall, West Union, Ia., last week were well attended, and the speaker was well liked by all.—Fayette Co. Union.

THE Manhattan Liberal Club will begin the fall campaign on Friday evening, October 1st. T. B. Wakeman will be the speaker, and "Liberalism the only Remedy for Earthquakes, Inorganic, Organic, and Social," his subject. This will be Mr. Wakeman's third inaugural address as president of the club. The man with the badge-pin will not be there and Mr. Shook can disport himself without fear of consequences. Said reporter, however, will be around later.

THE arrangements for J. E. Remsburg's meeting at Merrill, Wis., were made by ladies. Mrs. Heath and others raised nearly sixty dollars to defray the expenses. The Opera House was made attractiv by a rich display of beautiful flowers, and Mr. Remsburg declares the meeting to hav been one of the most pleasant and successful that he has held for many a day. When woman discards superstition and espouses the cause of reason, then will Freethought triumph.

MR. L. K. WASHBURN announces that during October he wishes engagements in the New England states to lecture wherever he can do good. In November he purposes to make New York state a visit, attending the Congress of the American Secular Union, and desires to lecturc every one of November's thirty days, except the dates of the Congress. To that end he invites correspondence that all arrangements may be perfected in ample time.

Letters from Friends.

JOBSTOWN, N. J., Sept. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Charles Watts gave two lectures in Arcade Hall, Mount Holly, N. J., on Monday and Tuesday evenings, September 13th and 14th. The subjects were: Monday evening, "The French Revolution—Atheistic or Theistic?" Tuesday evening, "The Reformation—Protestantism or Catholicism, Which?" The lectures were pronounced by those present to be the best ever delivered in Mount Holly. Mr. Watts is an eloquent and logical speaker, and I only wish the people would lay aside their bigotry and hear him just once; but it seems to be impossible to get the Christians to listen to anything outside of orthodoxy. All that heard him wish for his return.

SAM. R. WETHERILL,
Sec. Jobstown Secular Union.

LINOOLN, ILL., Sept. 11, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: In your last issue is an article of news about one Rev. Simpson, missionary, sailing to "heathen land" with tracts and new versions to "save" the poor savages in a ship freighted with "New England rum." This calls for a speech from some allite-ativ Burchard, who is said to hav killed Blaine with his three R's. Burchard could fitly say, apropos of what is involved in this crazy, foolish scheme for extorting money from dupes to afflict the poor savages, "I want none of it in mine; there is no call in 'reason, right, and reform' for a system that its friends claim is for the salvation of barbarians, when the proof is positiv that the only result is 'rum, raggedness, and religion.'" It puts me in mind of old Abe. He says he asked a Choctaw Indian boy once, "Are you Indian, my lad?" "No, sir; me part Injin, part missionary." How long will mankind be fools about this glaring folly of "missions?" It is only a means of giving places to lazy, non-producing tramps.

DUNDEE, MINN., Sept. 5, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Remsburg has just been with us, and lectured at Dundee, Fulda, and Heron Lake. While we were taking up a collection at Fulda to defray expenses, one of the prominent citizens, a good Catholic, struck the hat, scattering the contents on the floor. We suppose it was done for the glory of the Lord.

The Catholics are rather strong in this vicinity, but are not on very good terms with the almighty, as he sent a mighty wind a short time ago and shook up their church, damaging it about two hundred dollars' worth. We hav not had a personal interview with Jehovah as to why he did this, but suppose some poor devil was hungry and ate a piece of meat on Friday, which caused his wrath.

At Avoca they hav a large convent and school. Uncle Sam is paying them $167 a head per year for making Catholics out of fifty Indian girls. Our opinion is that this money is wasted, as we would prefer an uncivilized Indian to a half-civilized Catholic, as the one mentioned at Fulda appears to be.

The thinking people were well pleased with Mr. Remsburg's remarks, and should he come this way again he would draw a large audience.

Inclosed find 35 cents. Please send me Mr. Remsburg's works on "False Claims" and "Bible Morals," one of each, and a catalog of your books.

F. LINDQUIST.

JORDAN, MINN., July 16, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10.75, to be applied as follows: $2.50 each for myself, W. H. Baier, and Johnson Bragg, to renew our subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $2.50 for a new subscriber, Enos Bragg, and 75 cents for three ANNUALS for 1886.

It is quite amusing to notice the different opinions expressed by your correspondents in regard to the TRUTH SEEKER cartoons. Some say they are ashamed of them, some call them ludicrous, and some even call them ridiculous. Can it be possible that these so-called Liberals are ignorant of the fact that the pictures are not one-half as ridiculous as the subjects that they are intended to illustrate? I am glad, however, that the great majority are in favor of the pictures. In your issue of the 3d inst. are two letters, one from H. H. Gilman and one from Chas. C. Johnson, that hav the true ring of the genuin metal. I feel proud to know that there are such men—men who are not afraid of hurting the feelings of their Christian friends. I fully indorse the sentiments contained in these letters, and I believe that those shameful, ludicrous, ridiculous pictures are doing a vast amount of good by attracting attention to subjects that are far more shameful, more ludicrous, and more ridiculous than any pictures that hav appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Your subscribers here are highly pleased with the paper. It is all we could desire—except that valuable space is frequently occupied with lengthy articles that hav little or no value except their length. The cartoons are plenty good enough for us—we are not ashamed of them.

THOMAS KNOTT.

AXTELL, KAN., Sept. 8, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: We of this country are usually in debt, and if father or mother should be taken away the mortgages on our land would leave our orphans without any homes, and a safe, honest, and cheap life insurance would be the best thing, to make sure to our families a home, that I can think of; and yet we Atheists are not allowed in any of the secret societies, and those that are outside of them are used to furnish fat offices for the officers. Now, I wish that the American Secular Union, or the Truth Seeker Company, or some other society that is known to be honest, would giv the Liberals a mutual life insurance company that we can feel is safe, cheap, and free from Gods, hells, etc. Infidels conform to the laws of life more generally than the average people, and they ought to hav their own insurance.

Now as to the strength of our cause where I am acquainted. Our Union has a small membership, but we cannot get into a discussion on the streets but we find many that are ready to join on our side against Christianity. I can count fully ten that are as radical as any of us for each that is in our organization. At Seneca there are hundreds that are outspoken. At Marysville, Frankfort, and Centralia the same, and yet there is not a vote from all this country in the Secular Union Congress. Churches here are largely supported by mission funds, and poverty keeps many from buying suitable clothes to attend any meetings, and prevents us as a society from joining the American Secular Union.

E. W. MINER, Secretary A. L. U.

PHILADELPHIA, Sept. 22, E.M. 286.

MR. EDITOR: The meetings of the Friendship Liberal League at Industrial Hall, North Broad street, indicate a decided advance in the Liberal movement in Philadelphia. The regular afternoon and evening discussions hav been uninterrupted during the summer, the usual vacation being dispensed with, able speakers holding the public interest in spite of the high temperature.

On Sunday, September 12th, Mr. Charles Watts, of England, began a course of lectures under the auspices of the League, which were highly successful, bringing to our meetings a large addition of members. The lecture upon "The French Revolution—Atheistic or Deistic?" was a broadside for those who make use of that occasion to decry Liberalism. The historical facts and inferences, as presented by Mr. Watts, were searching and convincing, as evinced by the general attention and applause that greeted their delivery. In the evening "The Fall and the Atonement" was taken up. The Rev. Mr. Parker, of this city, entertained the audience by replying. On Sunday, September 19th, in the afternoon, Mr. Watts lectured upon "Protestantism or Catholicism, Which?" The theology of both was handled in a manner that left no ground for either to stand upon. The two Catholic clergymen present deeming it unwise to accept the invitation of the chair to reply to Mr. Watts, the Protestants contented themselvs by asking two or three questions, which were fully answered. In the evening, "Miracles, What Do They Prove?" was discussed. Mr. Brotherhead, one of the ablest Christian debaters in Philadelphia, took the floor in reply to Mr. Watts's remarks.

These lectures of Mr. Watts's hav awakened an interest heretofore unknown in Philadelphia, the large hall we engaged for the occasion being crowded at every lecture. On the last evening there were almost seven hundred persons present, including women and children.

The League has engaged Mr. Watts for lectures in November, and in January, upon Thomas Paine's anniversary, when we will hav our annual festival. In conclusion, I may say that there are plenty of Liberals in this city, who, if they felt so disposed, could hav one of the finest halls in town. All that is wanted is unity of action. I trust the Liberals throughout the entire country will see to it that Charles Watts be kept busy all through the lecture season, for he is, without flattery, the best representativ of the Liberal movement that we hav in this country.

GEO. LONGFORD, Secretary.

LOCKPORT, ILL., Aug. 31, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Why is it there are so many members of the Liberal school that persist in manifesting an intolerant spirit? To my mind, there is no direction in which our people betray their weakness more than in this tendency toward intolerance and misrepresentation. It were safe to say that there are many in our ranks that are quite as ready to throw mud or stones for difference of opinion (on certain topics) as are the Christians because we call them to account for their arrogance and injustice.

In our persistent efforts to demonstrate the debasing and enslaving tendencies of all popular forms of religion, there is no point of attack subject to our frequent assaults equal to that of their spirit of intolerance and persecution. We affirm, without fear of a denial, that Christianity has been the most intolerant of all religions, and, by its wars and Inquisition, the most selfish and cruel. With this consciousness ever before us as regards the intolerance of Christianity, it does seem as though all who call themselvs Liberals would avoid a narrowness of soul that has made the very name of Christian synouymous with bigotry and superstition.

The Christians will hav general cause for jubilation as they observe what splendid imitators many Liberals are of those peculiar traits that we said Christians alone would manifest. Liberalism is demonstrating also that it has its sects, some of whose so-called leaders are quite as harsh, and, to my mind, as unreasonable and unjust, as opposing sectaries usually are.

While none of us object to opposition or difference of opinion on any or all questions that concern human well-being, there seems to be no valid reason why this difference may not exist apart from intolerance. To be true to our highest interest is to court investigation, to rejoice at even sharp, if just, criticism of any pet notions or theories we entertain.

What we believe, or disbelieve, is never a question of ability, but simply one of integrity. What we do, more than what we believe, determins the measure of our manhood or womanhood. Our love of justice is best illustrated by a loving, tolerant spirit, and the only way to illustrate a correct knowledge of true freedom is jealous regard for the rights of those whose extreme opinions are the antipodes of our own.

It is true, however, that these wordy fights hav their funny phase, and in no direction is this more manifest than in the "I told you so" and "I knew it" asseverations of those who are happy to the full whenever a Dr. Bouton or some similar fraud is exposed. They are sure a few more such exposures will end the superstition of Spiritualism and set us deluded ones knocking at the door of Materialism for entrance to its unsuperstitious domain.

If all Spiritualists are as unmoved as I am at this exposure and as tolerant of the "I told you so's," we will be as happy as Sisters Elmina and Ella Gibson can possibly be. My Spiritualism does not, did not, rest on any Bouton foundation, and these sisters can rest in one fact—that if we cannot equal them in mental grasp and perception we are their peer in tolerance. Definitions make a mighty difference. Like many others of fairly respectable people, we are Freelovers, not as Walser defines it, but as Juliet H. Severance does. I, for one, dare to stand or fall by her definition in the pamphlet that contained her discussion with a certain reverend a year or two ago, published by herself. As between Walser and Stewart on the one hand, and Heywood and Walker on the other, I elect to go with the latter, and that, too, without any intolerance toward the former.

Tastes will differ. Then, again, when Brother Walser charges the Sinaloa colony members as being Freelovers, as he defines it, and attempts to throw this kind of mud at the grand attempt to solve the problem of industrial and social life, he manifests a spirit of intolerance that does great injustice to the better perceptions of G. H. Walser at his best.

Even on the matter of the TRUTH SEEKER illustrations, some there be who can't imagin that a party can be anything less than a moral coward who don't like and won't go into ecstasies over them. For the sake of pricking the bubble of this conceit, I will say to this class I do not like them and never had any taste for ridiculing an opponent, but I am tolerant enough to let others enjoy a different opinion and to think they may hav the best of the argument. True moral courage seldom parades itself; its speech is in deeds of duty; it never listens to the voice of majorities as such; happy indeed if with the multitude, undaunted if alone.

Liberalism has much to answer for in its too ready disposition to place itself in a belligerent attitude, that is often quite as unreasonable and unreasoning as any in which Christianity poses, and for its lack of toleration toward anything that touches its peculiar notions as to what is and what is not moral.

For one, I would much rather be gagged by Christianity than by any Puritanic form of Liberalism. Gags, thumbscrews, and intolerance are legitimate Christian fruits; used by Liberalists, they are the very concentration of dishonesty and injustice.

One of the writers of the letters for THE TRUTH SEEKER, Aug. 21st, M. B. Delano, is quite sure that those who advocate that it were better to hav our usual matter in the place of the cartoons are "poor, timid souls, afraid of popularity or the society where they liv." This fact is very evident, that Brother Delano may liv long enough to learn his mistake, and that it is quite possible for an honest difference of opinion to exist on this, as well as many other matters, where the question of moral courage is about even.

Every honest mind must discover this potent truth, that, with equal sincerity, equal desire for the most advanced truth, and equal earnestness for its advancement, but very few of us take precisely the same view of many important questions. I think it the rule that honest, independent thinkers are very apt to approach (if I may use a figure) the temple or structure of a principle at different points, and to observe from those varied approaches the best methods of presenting it for consideration.

Take, for instance, the question of temperance. For forty-six years I felt it a privilege, as well as a duty, to work in that cause. Nearly all that has been written in THE TRUTH SEEKER pro and con of Prohibition I hav read. Brothers Walker and Bell hav interested me very much by their ability against Prohibition, and, while they are men that I honor and respect, I cannot see as they do. Am I less Liberal on that account?

Am I right in supposing that Liberalism means an honest desire to hav all questions that concern human well-being fairly and thoroughly discussed, with due respect for the rights of all parties, and a determination not to claim for ourselvs more than we are willing to concede to others, and an equal determination not to allow any man or society of men, Secular, or so-called sacred, to dictate what we shall or shall not believe? As a part of this natural fruit of Liberalism, it seems but reasonable that there is no limit to our right to differ or our right to think what we please and how we please, as regards the existence or non-existence of God or gods, or whether this life "ends all" or not. Mere matters of opinion are our own. The acts that spring from these opinions are what make right or wrongs. If an opinion that we parade generates intolerance, that is illiberal. If the fruit of any thought in me begets any form of injustice toward others, then in that regard I misrepresent true Liberalism.

There are few men or women in the common walks of life that can find the time to examin many of the important questions that present themselvs for consideration, and for this reason most of us know but very little about them, and therefore it is sensible to be careful how we condemn what we know so little about. Would we adopt the wise precaution of taking a little time to try to understand each other, whenever any new agitation is started, it would save a great amount of fault-finding and misunderstanding. Because this course is not pursued, hasty judgment, ill-advised assumption, and too often downright misrepresentation are what we see and hear, and what is the source of untold regret is the fact that Liberals are but a trifle in advance of that very class of Christians the cartoons and illustrations so unmercifully lampoon.

GEORGE LYNN.

HAMILTON, ONT., Sept. 15, 286.

MR. EDITOR: The Secularists of Hamilton and vicinity hav had another visit from our Secular champion, Mr. C. Watts, and we eujoyed a grand intellectual feast during the delivery of his last two lectures, "Secularism—Its Past, Present, and Future," and "Saints or Sinuers—Which?" At his first a young theological student essayed to dispute some of Mr. Watts's propositions by claiming that Secularism as taught by Mr. Watts was but another name for Christianity. The fallacy of his reasoning was at once made manifest, even to the disputant, when the lecturer showed the audience the fundamental principles claimed by Christians as being necessary to be believed in to obtain salvation from a mythical hell beyond the grave, whereas Secularism treated only of the knowable in this life.

I am very much pleased at the increase of the TRUTH SEEKER family here, but I should be better pleased were they to attend our lectures when a few of us bring along a lecturer, as it becomes monotonous to those who hav to meet the deficit when we count the cost. Hoping this hint will not offend, I am, etc., GEO. MADDOCKS.

DOWLIN, TEXAS, Sept. 9, 286.

MR. EDITOR: I am the same grandpa that requested you in 1884 to tell your readers that I was born Jan. 31, 1799, and that I wished every person now in the United States that was born about that time would drop me a postal card telling who and where. Well, I yet liv, on the 9th day of the ninth month of the year 1886.

Now, old brothers and sisters, let me hear from you. I am afraid you are but a very few, and that few too old and trembling to write. Well, one ought not to complain. We hav outlived many millions who were born after we were. I hav been a lucky child. My mother marked me with a love of truth before I was born. I can say in truth that I hav told but one criminal lie in my life. I never was in a house of ill-fame. I never was drunk; never had a fight; hav not cursed in fifty years. I threw away my tobacco twenty years ago, after using it thirty-four years, and hav not used a particle since. Indeed, I am egotistic. I feel like Moses when he said, "Now the man Moses was meeker than all the men on the face of the earth." I am proud of virtues. All good deeds should be known, as examples for the world to go by. The world needs good examples more than it needs good counsel and advice.

I hav been governed by conscience through life. I would not crook a finger or wink an eye if conscience forbade. I hold mental agony is the only hell. We choose to regret a crime. So we are our own punishers or executioners. That is all right. Regret brings reformation; reformation brings progress; progress brings perfection; and perfection brings peace, and peace is but another word for heaven. All may win a heaven at last, and hell be left out in the cold with its nasty brimstone, and no market for it.

J. A. RUTHERFORD.

OTTUMWA, IA., Sept. 13, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The Ottumwa Liberal Society has resumed its meetings, and will again furnish intellectual food for the thinking men and women of this city.

The opening lecture of this season was delivered by our noble worker S. P. Putnam, and a grand effort it was. How great, how inspiring, his lectures! Never did I feel so proud of the fact that I am an Infidel as I did after hearing Mr. Putnam's discourse on "The Glory of Infidelity."

Would that there were a thousand such earnest workers in the Liberal ranks, that they might go forth, and, with unfaltering step, approach and break down the barriers which hav been erected by ignorance and superstition, and scatter over this broad and fruitful land the seeds of justice, love, and truth.

Although we hav had a flourishing Liberal Union in our midst for a number of years, nevertheless he or she who would be sure of success must still cling to the falling branch of superstition, and keep from his fellow-men all the great and glorious thoughts he may possess. But when I look upon the cruel past, with its horde of priests and preachers, and then upon the efforts of such men as Putnam, Reynolds, C. W. Stewart, and Heston, I do not hesitate to exclaim, "The time is near when the spotless robes of morality and science will cover the dark and bloody field of superstition."

My fellow-workers, hasten the time when we shall realize "the new heaven and earth." Teach the rising generation only that knowledge which will decide the question of their respectability, usefulness, and happiness in this world, that they may no longer cling to the idea that, however mean and vicious their thoughts and ideas may be, there is an infinit God who, if they only believe in him, will overlook their crimes, and "though their sins be as scarlet, yet will he wash them whiter than snow."

Why should we teach this terrible doctrin when our eyes hav been opened to the glorious truths of science? Next Sunday we will hav the pleasure of listening to those great reformers, Prof. W. F. Peck and Mrs. H. S. Lake, with whose writings the TRUTH SEEKER readers are well acquainted. Let us hope that their efforts may awaken the intellectual faculties of those who are still keeping time to the tune of orthodox hymns, and whose brains hav been poisoned by orthodox food. KATIE KEHM.

THE CHURCH A MIND-STEALER.

CLEVELAND, O., Sept. 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read the rules of the Methodist Episcopal church, in their Church Disciplin, and a member who follows them has to permit his mind to be put in bondage, and accept total depravity. He is not allowed to think and read for himself, but has to follow the dictates of the ministers.

First, the profaning the day of the Lord, either by doing ordinary work therein or by buying or selling, is prohibited. They want to dictate what the people shall do Sundays. If they tell the people that going into the woods by some shady brook on Sundays and having a good time with your families and friends is profaning the day of the Lord, then you must stay at home, and go to church, and listen to the minister tell the same old story he has told the Sunday before.

Second, uncharitable or unprofitable conversation, particularly speaking evil of magistrates or of ministers, is also prohibited. Here we see they want to dictate what kind of language people shall use, and what their conversation shall be composed of. And especially they must not speak evil of these ministers. They want the people to look up to them and respect them as a higher class, and superior to the rest of mankind. Why should these ministers ask the people to respect them more thau other men? Just think of it—these ministers that try to keep the people in ignorance, that try to cage their minds, want the people to respect, support, and look upon them as men of God! We hav a right to say what we please about them as long as we tell the truth.

Third, putting on of gold and costly apparel is prohibited. Here, again, we see they want to say what the people shall wear, how much gold to put on, and how costly their wearing apparel shall be. What is it of the church's business what the people wear? They hav no right to dictate what people shall wear. You had just as well try to stop the Mississippi river at its mouth as to hinder a woman from buying fine clothes.

Fourth, taking such diversions as cannot be used in the name of the Lord Jesus is prohibited. Here we see they want to dictate what kind of sport and amusements the people shall indulge in. Open-air concerts, Sunday picnics, fishing parties, and pleasure of all kinds are prohibited unless done in the name of the Lord Jesus.

Fifth, singing those songs, or reading those books, which do not tend to the knowledge or love of God, is prohibited. They not only tell us what our pleasure shall consist of, but they want to tell the people what they shall sing and read. What if this plan of theirs was carried out and we could hear no songs but religious songs? I don't think there would be very much singing, and what singing we would hav no one except church-members would care to hear. Our mind was given us by the creator, and he gave it to us to think and investigate just as we please. The ministers tell us it is a sin to read the works of Paine, Voltaire, and Ingersoll, but all sensible men and women know they hav a right to think and read what they please. The churches are doing all they can to keep the people from reading Liberal books, for they know that just as soon as the people begin to read and investigate for themselvs they will no longer believe in their fabulous doctrins. They are afraid to hav their laws and doctrins examined. But just as soon as people begin to doubt their creed, then they begin to investigate it, and as soon as they hav given it a thorough investigation, they see the inconsisteucy of it, and they no longer believe it.

Just as long as the church can keep the people ignorant, just so long will this doctriu be believed. Just so long as the people will allow their prejudice to hav control of their minds, just so long will they believe the Bible myths.

Now, I don't want it understood by what I hav said that I am speaking of the Methodist church alone because I take their disciplin for my subject, for I hav just the same views about all the other churches.

Yours for liberality, fraternity, and equality,

J. A. WEABER.

ST. CATHARINES, ONT., Sept. 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 21, 1886, that the wheat transmutation theory is still believed. I was born on a farm, and helped raise wheat till I was sixty, and in the early part of that period I often observed that after a cold, wet, and backward spring the winter wheat would hav a great deal of chess on all the low, wet land, and on the lowest it would sometimes be all chess; and wheat sowed on wheat stubble would generally hav a good deal of chess. When young I heard some farmers say that wheat would often turn to (then called) drips; others again denied it. The cases that M. P. Thurston has cited, and the four following, strengthen the inference that such a change is sometimes the result. First, we plowed sixteen acres of level sod once in June, that had lain five years, and sowed it in August; and it showed well in the fall and early next spring, but later it went what farmers called "back," and got bunchy, and yielded only about two-fourths of a crop of short straw, and that was half chess. This field, a few years previous, on pea stubble, sowed September 20th, yielded first-rate straw and wheat. Second, plowed twenty-four acres of rolling sod once in June, that had lain four years, and sowed it September 1st, and it yielded a good crop of straw and wheat; plowed it again early in August, and the upturned, well-rotted sod showed a fine, rich mold that we thought was equal to fallow, which we sowed September 1st, and the season was favorable during its growth, but from first to last it looked puny, and yielded only half a crop of stunted straw, and that was fully one-third chess, while a fallow side of it, plowed twice and sowed the same week with the same kind of wheat, yielded good straw and wheat, but no chess. Third, I knew a young farmer who cleared five acres of thick forest, and raised a good crop of wheat, and heard him say to an old farmer that he would burn his stubble and sow it again. The latter said it might all turn to drips, as he had seen more crops of drips raised on wheat stubble than wheat. This the former ridiculed, which angered the latter, and he gruffly said, "Any fool knows wheat will sometimes turn to drips." But the former firmly believed that wheat would bring wheat again, and accordingly sowed his stubble field and his new ground (five acres) with wheat from his first new ground. The wheat grew luxuriantly (I saw it) on both fields, and the young farmer was sure of two good crops of wheat. But alas! when it headed out he was almost dumfounded to see that his stubble field had yielded chess instead of wheat. He was now sure that wheat would turn to chess, for he had seen it with his eyes. Shortly after he met that old farmer in my presence, and said to him, "The wheat on my stubble field has all turned to drips." The latter said exultingly, "Didn't I tell you?" etc. I went five miles to see those fields, side by side; and what a contrast! On the stubble field was a heavy crop of plump chess, except a few scattering heads of wheat, and on the new ground a good crop of wheat. Fourth, we once stacked wheat on sod that never had been plowed, and the wheat that fell on the sod came up very thick, and looked somewhat like matted wool. The stack was taken away in the winter, and the next July there was a heavy crop of plump chess, with only a few heads of wheat, where the wheat had come up so thick the previous August. I saw, several times, chess standing very thick in July where wheat-stacks had been made the previous August. M. P. Thurston's and the preceding cases favor the theory that wheat will sometimes turn to chess, but they by no means prove it. I was taught that wheat would turn to chess, and, seeing so many cases that looked like it, I, of course, believed it. However, later we got land on which near a barn was a small (then called) frog pond that had been used perhaps sixty years for watering stock, and was now about filled with manure, ground, etc. This we scraped out four feet deep one fall when it was dry, and spread it on timothy sod by the pond. And next July my brother and I were surprised to see a heavy crop of plump chess where that muck and ground had been put, but no heads of wheat. This not only convinced us, but proved beyond the possibility of a doubt, that that chess did not come from wheat, for none had been there for years. Previous to this we had scraped the muck out of more than one hundred such ponds, and spread it on sod, stubble, and fallow ground, but no chess was seen. M. P. Thurston believes that wheat will turn to chess if it is choked and badly treated when growing, but of this we hav had overwhelming proof to the contrary. We often sowed oats stubble, and in warm, wet falls the oats would always grow so thick and rank that we thought the wheat would be all smothered, but it yielded wheat. Again, we plowed oats stubble the second time to kill the green oats, and sowed it October 15th (too late for a good crop), and it came up good, but the winter was open and geese cropped it (till spring) so short that we thought there would be no wheat, but to our surprise it yielded a good crop of plump wheat.

Again, we plowed six acres of stiff timothy sod once in June, and sowed it September 1st, and the fall was wet, and if ever wheat was choked with grass it was that six acres, for the timothy grew so thick that only about one-fourth of the wheat headed out, but what did was wheat. Again, when sowing wheat we sometimes spilt it, and it would always come up so thick that it looked like a mat, and very little of the stunted straw, with only a grain or two in a head, would head out, but it was always wheat. Notwithstanding all that has been said to the contrary, I am positiv that wheat will not turn to chess. Nevertheless, I admit that the origin of chess and many other plants is involved in mystery, and the following queries boldly confront me.

I know by experience that if chess is put in the ground in the fall, it will come up, grow, and ripen the next summer, just like wheat. Now, if chess is in the ground, as is affirmed, why did it not grow the first year on that new ground? Why did so much chess grow on the same ground the second year? Why did no chess grow on that sixteen acres for many years, and then so much grow one year and none afterwards? Why did no chess grow on that twenty-four acres the first year? Why did so much grow on the same field the second year? Why did so much chess grow on that sod by the stack where the wheat had come up so thick in the previous August and none in the rest of the field? Why did so much chess grow on M. P. Thurston's six acres of barley stubble, and none on the rest of the field? Why did chess grow only in that fence-corner where a horse ate some wheat? We know that plant seeds are perishable, neither can plants grow and mature their seeds in a thick forest; then whence come the seeds from which the different grasses and herbaceous plants grow and cover the ground the first summer after a thick forest has been cleared? Hav their seeds lain dormant in the ground for thousands of years? Or hav they been evolved in the grouud after the forest was cleared? TRUTH SEEKER philosophers, please uuravel this (to me) incomprehensible mystery, and this much-disputed chess question, and set the matter forever at rest. Now, Brother Thurston, notwithstauding the editorial answer, No, to the question, Will wheat turn to chess? is contrary to your belief, it is nevertheless correct. Now, if you believe that wheat will turn to chess, it, of course, devolves on you to prove it; therefore you should test it by fair experiment, namely, heat ground until you are sure every seed in it is killed; then put the ground in a pot or box and sow wheat in it, or any other grain that you think will choke it, and treat the seed during its growth as badly as you like, and I am positiv that you can no more turn it into chess thau you can turn horse-hairs into snakes. A. MOOT.

P. S.—Inclosed you will find $5 for C. B. Reynolds's defense against those low, vile, wretched, degraded, abominable, and despicable religious fanatics at Boonton. I hope Mr. Reynolds will boldly confront those superstitious bigots, and teach them the religion of this world, based upon love, mercy, and justice, and I think they will see that their outrageous acts at Boonton hav brought contempt and shame on their shameless heads that will disgrace them whilst they liv. I hope Mr. Reynolds will come out victorious with honor bright. A. M.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Barney's Cow.

Barney had a cow that got into his neighbor's barn and ate a bushel of corn (so the neighbor said), so Barney paid for a bushel of corn, and, feeling somewhat indignant, applied to the undersigned to write something about it; hence the following verses.

Go, Barney, go; yes, straightway go,
To Barnum with your bovine;
Such marvels in a mammoth show
Would make folks stare, I opine.

Not many beasts, or cows, at least,
Can boast of such a paunch, sir;
One bushel must hav been a feast,
And taxed her teeth to craunch, sir.

Had I a cow like her, I vow
I'd practice stirpiculture,
And every calf (now don't you laugh)
I'd raise with careful nurture.

I never knew a cow—did you?—
With stomach so capacious;
Four pecks of corn! and duly sworn
By neighbor Tim, by gracious!

Say, Barney, now, sell me that cow,
And corn enough to feed her;
Four pecks a day with good sweet hay—
Now don't say, "You don't need her."

As true's I liv, I'd freely giv
Ten V's for such a creature,
And all forlorn I'd giv her corn,
And Harrington should teach her

Legerdemain, and then again
There's money to be made, sir.
She won't go dry; I'll tell you why:
Corn makes milk—now we'll trade, sir,

And let us sing long liv the king,
And Barney, long liv he, sir,
And when his cow eats anything
May I be there to see, sir. R. F. ROBBINS.

The Wayside Inn—An Apple-tree.

I halted at a pleasant inn,
As I my way was wending;
A golden apple was the sign,
From knotty bough depending.

Mine host—it was an apple-tree—
He smilingly received me,
And spread his choicest, sweetest fruit,
To strengthen and relieve me.

Full many a little feathered guest
Came through his branches springing;
They hopped and flew from spray to spray,
Their notes of gladness singing.

Beneath his shade I laid me down,
And slumber sweet possessed me;
The soft wind blowing through the leaves
With whispers low caressed me.

And when I rose, and would hav paid
My host, so open-hearted,
He only shook his lofty head—
I blessed him, and departed.

Gossipy Grace.

"I want to tell you something, girls. Now, you just listen. They do say that Emily Bennett's mother is real stingy. She will not let Emily hav any money to buy chocolate creams! Don't you think that's mean?" and Grace Bond looked from one to the other of her companions with the triumphant air of one who has communicated an important piece of news.

"It's just awful!" said Etta Crinkett.

"If my mother should do so I'd kick some, I guess," snapped Luna Fowler.

"And she makes Emily wash the dishes and clean the silver, and wash her own clothes. What do you think of that?" said Grace, pressing her lips tightly together.

"Horrid!" they all exclaimed.

"And her father and mother hav disputes about the children wearing out shoes. I've heard 'em! And Emily has got to hav a thick pair of clumpers if she keeps on kicking her boots out at the toes. There! Her mother makes over old stockings for Emily, too. Don't you remember Emily's pretty red stockings? Well, they were made over out of her Aunt Violet's."

"Why, I'm astonished, Grace!" exclaimed Meta Johnson. "But where did you get so much news?"

"Oh, I've been there a good deal, and they did not mind talking before me, you know."

"Look here, Grace, you just stop that tongue of yours from wagging in such a shameful manner," and young Robert Bond appeared on the scene. "I'm your brother, but if you persist in your gossip I shall be ashamed to own the relationship. Do you know what I heard some one call you, yesterday?"

"No; what was it?" inquired Grace, anxiously.

"Well, I heard some one say, 'There goes that little gossipy Grace. Young as she is, she appears to know everybody's business.' And I tell you I was mightily ashamed."

"Why, I didn't mean any harm."

"Oh, no; of course you didn't. Nobody does when discussing a neighbor's affairs or somebody's character."

"We were only talking," remarked Etta Crinkett. "Girls must hav something to talk about."

"But can't such little girls as you find something else to occupy your minds and conversation than discussing the dress, manners, or home conduct of your friends? It's a great idea, I must say, if your minds are so vacant as not to contain anything more sensible than such silly gossip," and Robert appeared disgusted and mortified.

"Maybe you'll tell us what to talk about, Master Robert," sneered Luna Fowler.

"Tell you what to talk about? Yes, there's rocks—talk about them if you cannot find any other subject."

"Rocks! What is a rock? Pooh! Anybody knows what a rock is," and Grace tossed her head.

Etta picked up a chip of granit and threw it into Grace's lap. "What is that?" she asked, laughingly.

"I should think anybody would know that that is granit," responded Grace.

"And what is granit?" inquired Robert. "Anyone may speak."

"Oh, we are not old enough to know about geology," said Meta.

"Of course not," declared Robert. "But old enough to gossip and tell tales about other girls and their friends. Pshaw! Well, girls, I will tell you what granit is. There are different kinds of granit, but, in this piece, which is the true granit, there are three minerals—see, there is feldspar, and quartz, and here is shining mica, all mixed up, yet all distinct in separate grains. The very word, granit, is from the Italian grano, and means grain. You see it looks like little grains. And then there is water, but that you cannot see. It is, apparently, the lowest rock in the formation of the earth, and yet it is found on the highest mountain peak of Europe, Mount Blanc, and, in our own country, it exists on the top of the Rocky mountains, and you see it almost everywhere in the New England states."

"That's what they build mills and churches with, isn't it?" asked Grace.

"Of course, and many other structures. You ought to go to the quarries and see how it is got out of the earth. A granit quarry is a very interesting place to visit, I can tell you," said Robert. "The old people that lived thousands of years ago in Egypt thought a great deal of it. Why, some of their great obelisks and pyramids, you must understand, were built of granit, and hav stood the wear and tear of time fully three thousand years. Pompey's Pillar, that you hav read about, is made of granit."

"It is very hard, isn't it?" said Etta.

"Yes; but hard as it is, it can be made as soft as dough. The Hot Springs in California are changing by their action the very hardest rocks into clay."

"Now, you wouldn't think you could melt such a hard rock, would you?" continued Robert.

"I shouldn't," said Meta, with dilated eyes.

"But it can be done just the same, though. Subject it to sufficient heat and it is turned into a whitish, greasy-looking fluid, and more heat still makes it a kind of a gas, and then it can still be heated so that it will float away right before your eyes—disappear into thin air."

"And it seems so hard, too," mused Luna.

"Melted rocks! Only think of it!" said Etta.

"I mean to go and see a quarry, some time," declared Meta.

"You had better all go," said Robert. "It is much more interesting than talking about folks, I can tell you. There is a fine one out at Fall River, Mass., upon the edge of which is a 'rocking stone' or a 'rolling rock,' which you might like to investigate."

"What is a 'rocking stone?'" asked Grace.

"It is a big boulder so evenly balanced that it will oscillate by just touching it with the hand, though it would take an immense force to dislodge it from its place."

"I hav seen the 'rolling rock' many a time," said Meta.

"And so hav I," said Grace. "How much do you suppose it weighs?"

"Only about one hundred and sixty tons!"

"My!" they all exclaimed together.

"Yes; but there was a bigger one than that once in the same city, near the river, in a ridge of gravel. It is all gone now, all split up, but it originally weighed over ten million pounds! What do you think of that?"

"Was that a rocking stone, too?"

"No; it was not poised so delicately," replied Robert.

"Was it made of granit?"

"Oh, no; it was what is called 'pudding stone,' and so is the 'rolling rock.' It is composed of gravel and pebbles all cemented and stuck together, so that it looks like plum-pudding—hence its name. Oh, I tell you there are histories in all the rocks, and they tell of fire and flood, and many miles of travel, because the rocks belonging to what is called the 'Drift period' hav come to us a long way, swept down and deposited by forces of which we can hardly conceive."

"Why, it is very wonderful," said Etta. "And honestly, do you not think it is better to be learning something of this earth, and the common things we see about us, but of which we know little enough, than to waste our time in gossip and silly chatter about our friends and neighbors?"

"Certainly," said Meta.

"Of course," said the others.

"But now tell me, Rob, did you actually hear some one call me 'Gossipy Grace?'"

"Yes, I did, truly."

"Well, I am awfully ashamed of it. I don't think I will be called that any more, though. Yonder comes Emily Bennett now, and she is just as good as any girl, if her stockings are made-over ones."

"Grace!" and Robert looked frowningly.

"I s'pose her mother thinks chocolate creams unwholesome," said Etta.

"Well; let us say no more about it, Etta, but let us tell her about the rocks," and when she came up to them Luna began explaining about the granit, and showing her the specks of mica and feldspar.

"Why, girls," laughed Emily, "that is nothing new. I know all about it," and she commenced telling much more about the rocks than Robert had told.

They were all astonished, and inquired how she had learned so much.

"Mother and I read it together, evenings," was her reply. "My mother does not believe in tattling, you know, and we spend our leisure time reading and studying. And it is just beautiful to learn all about the world we liv in, I think."

So they separated and went their ways, Grace, looking very grave, thinking of the title she had unconsciously earned.

"I'm terribly ashamed," she thought, "but, maybe, it will be outgrown and forgotten, if I try to improve my mind. I hope so, for I would feel dreadfully to go through my life and be known by such a name always. I'd better be improving my mind, and learning something, truly, than thinking and talking about such trifles."

"The granit rocks disorganize
And feed the hungry moss they bear;
The forest leaves drink daily life
From out the viewless air.

"And so may you, Grace," said Robert, "and I, and everybody, expand our minds and grow by absorbing knowledge, and thus will life appear more beautiful the more we learn of the uses, economy, and make-up of the simple things that we stumble upon in our pathway." S. H. W.

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—SOMETHING MOST IMPORTANT.

The whole, as represented by the nine significant figures taken all together in consecutiv order as one number, is of such great value that if one ducat be subtracted, there still remains 34,333,333.

It is also of such great weight that if one ton be subtracted there is still left 122,565,100.

Its literal intrinsic value is so great that if nine of itself be multiplied by ten of itself, the product is 6,060,629.

If the reader has only a fair modicum of the whole, the solution of this enigma will not be very hard. J. K. P. BAKER.

THE RISE OF
INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY
From Thales to Copernicus.
By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."
"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a reveation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

Obituary.

Mr. John Duff McDonald, who died on September 7th at 44 East Twelfth street, was a well-known Liberal thinker and labor reformer, whose interest has never flagged, though for the past fourteen years he had been withdrawn by paralysis from activ contact with his fellows and the direct movement.

Mr. McDonald was a nativ of Nova Scotia, born there in January, 1883. Coming to New York early in 1860, he pursued a commercial life. For many years past he has been at the head of a leading house for designing and manufacturing art designs, such as are used in embroidery, painting, etc. But Mr. McDonald's real life was in his keen sympathy with all efforts for the betterment of the social condition. He was a Liberal in religion, and a radical in economic affairs. The condition of Ireland, the democratic movement in Europe, the labor agitation here, all received his hearty support. Before his attack in 1872 he was a vigorous worker, while from his sick chamber for fourteen years thereafter he sent constantly words of cheer, and often substantial aid to help on the various efforts to which his intelligence gave support.

Mr. McDonald was a man of fine intellect and scholarly habits, a close student and a clear thinker.

THE DAWNING. A Novel. Lee & Shepard. Price, $1.50. For sale at this office.

This is a novel with a purpose, and its purpose is to get some plain truths regarding the coming social revolution before folks who would never read a work like "Rational Communism" or "Social Wealth." The usual novel-reader likes a thrilling plot—a bait to draw him on. The author of "The Dawning" has furnished this plot in admirable shape, and surrounded it with as much social heresy as he conveniently could. The book is in the nature of a warning of evil to come rather than an attempt to provide prophylactics. The author sees that the world is upside down, but is conscious that a bald statement to that effect will hav little weight with the average reader, who believes that sin and misery are inevitable afflictions of the human race, and that we must look to a future world to right the wrongs of this. In the guise of a love story, therefore, "The Dawning" comes as a prophet, a sort of John the Baptist among novels, to cry in the wilderness of fashionable readers. There are, then, two sides to it to commend—its romantic and its practical sides. The story is of a country girl, married to a man with an alias, who takes her to Boston and deserts her, going to Europe and marrying a woman of wealth. The deserted girl is found on the streets and cared for by a mechanic, who, we should judge, is a member of some labor lyceum. The chief personage and social heretic of the story, a wealthy merchant's son, becomes interested, and devotes a good deal of his time to finding out who the absconding wretch is. In this he is assisted by a legal friend. While searching for the heavy villain, he sows the seeds of heresy among his fashionable friends, most of whom grow chilly toward him. One that remains true is the daughter of a Beacon Hill aristocrat, who refuses to marry the legal gentleman, though urged thereto by her parents. The search for the villain is unsuccessful till he returns from Europe with his wife, his Christian reputation having sheltered him from suspicion. He is at last found, and while denouncing the social heretic at his club is arrested. There is much dramatic justice in this, for most of those who denounce others for holding radical views are guilty of extremely radical practices. One of the interesting incidents connected with the villain is that his second wife does not love him, but does love a young secretary of her father's, who has been defrauded out of a fortune, and compelled to earn a living. This secretary, who has been a wanderer over the earth because of his hopeless love, gets around at the right time, and weds the woman who has always loved him, and acknowledged it even before her marriage to the villain. The social heretic's father loses his property, some of it through the machinations of a sanctimonious church-member, and the social heretic loses most of his friends. The daughter of the Beacon Hill aristocrat, however, after refusing the lawyer, recognizes in the heretic the man whom she loves and reverences, and one evening when he calls to talk social philosophy the conversation drifts into personalities, and they mutually declare their love. This love passage affords the author the opportunity for some fine writing, and he has wonderfully well improved it. Its perusal will cause a married man to court his wife over again. The book contains many similar paintings of love's shy expression, done by a hand that is, if not a master's, at least no novice's. One particularly natural description of how the master passion finds vent is the story of the young secretary and his employer's magnificent daughter. He was alone in the library, and had decided to giv his employer notice he must leave. As he sat down to write, Julia opened the door.

"'"Excuse me," she said, "I did not know you were here. I am after a book."

"'I arose to leave. "Mr. Romayne," she said, "why are you so shy?"

"'I felt terrified. She had never spoken to me in that way. I could not open my lips.

"'"You need not go," she added; "I'll be but a minute."

"'I felt this like a command, and sat down to my work, while she looked over the shelves. But I could not go on. My eyes were turned away from her, but her image filled my sight, and the figures before me were lost in its dazzling brightness. Soon she moved toward me. I saw no movement, I heard no step, but I felt that she was near. She came behind my chair, and leaned over me—I trembled helplessly.

"'"Why do your fingers tremble so?" she said. "Those horrid figures tire you out."

"'She stooped down as if to look at the accounts. Her face was close to mine—my pulses were on fire.

"'I rose again. "Miss Sibley, pardon me," I stammered. "No, I am not tired."

"'"Then do not let me interrupt you," she said.

"'"I—I will take them to my room," I managed to say.

"'"Do not be at the trouble," she said. "I am going."

"'I was desperate. I had been for a moment in exquisit, painful bliss, and the vision was about to vanish.

"'She turned toward the door, giving me a glance—my soul! the rapture of it was so intense that a strange faintness came over me. I reached out my hands like one falling.

"'"What is it?" she said, smiling.

"'Could I think of propriety, honor, discretion, with a fever in my veins?

"'"Miss Sibley," I cried, blunderingly, "what—what does it mean?"

"'"It means that—I hav your secret. I hav suspected, and you hav disclosed it."

"'"And yours—what is yours?" I exclaimed, hardly knowing what I said.

"'A tear sparkled on her lashes as she came back, lifted her hand till it touched mine, and said, very softly—

"'"There it is!"'"

The power of the author is seen from this extract. The story ends in the usual happy way. The villain reforms and his deserted wife takes him again to her heart; the young secretary and his love are united; the social heretic marries the one only girl in the world worthy of him; her father blesses them, and they devote their wealth to seeking justice for the laborers.

The other side of the novel is no less effectivly written. In one of the conversations between the social heretic and the daughter of the Beacon Hill aristocrat occur these paragraphs, which we cannot help thinking are the sentiments of the author himself, and, if this be so, stand as the purpose of the work. They at least will serve to show the quality of the radicalism of the writer:

"'The inequalities [social] which pain us are the direct outcome of social despotism. The possession of wealth means, simply, power over men. You will find this in Ruskin, which I hav just brought. The value to me of a dollar consists solely in the fact that another man is destitute of a dollar. If I hav no more dollars than he has, I cannot compel him to sell his services or commodities on my terms—I hav no power over him. Deprive him of his dollars, and he becomes to a certain extent my slave. In the light of these facts has been constructed the popular system of economy; by which it is not enough that you become rich—you must also contrive to make others poor. This is the root of all social wrongs.'

"'But in what way are people made poor?'

"'They will tell you it is because of indolence or vice. But this cannot be true, since, as a rule, the toilers who produce the wealth are poor, and the rich are idlers who put their hands to no productiv industry whatever. You would say, would you not, that the man who makes a thing should own it?'

"'Nothing else can be just. Is that denied?'

"'Practically it is. We read in the sacred book, "If any will not work, neither shall he eat;" but the words seem now to be changed into the maxim, "If any will not work, he shall be a millionaire."'

"'I was reading in papa's paper, to-day, that no aristocracy of wealth could arise here, because so many fortunes, gathered in one lifetime, are scattered among the people in the next, and all the while wealth is being equalized.'

"'That delusion is very stale. A fortune sometimes changes hands, but it goes to swell the possessions of those already rich, and, if anything, the people are poorer for the transfer.'

"'In what way do men of wealth use their power?'

"'By abolishing the old maxim, "There are two sides to a bargain." They know but one side, and that is theirs. They make the prices they take, and the prices they giv. They go further than this, and even control the opinions of those they defraud. That there may be no danger of an upheaval, they endeavor to enslave the minds of their victims.

"'More than this, pliant law-makers create monopolies in their behalf. Suppose a law should giv to Stearns and five of his fellow-workmen the exclusiv privilege of constructing all the buildings to be erected in this ward for all time to come, on the pretense that they would build better houses—there are six journeymen mechanics converted into millionaires by act of the legislature. But if Stearns asked for such an act he would be driven in disgrace from the state house. Yet monopolies as unjust and preposterous as that would be hav been secured by men who could command the requisit influence. Wealth enjoys the chief benefits of legislation.'

"'The people who labor are poor because they do not receive their just due, that is what you mean. Then how can their rights be secured?'

"'That is too much for me to say. I do not see how justice can be established with out a social revolution.'

"'You are not thinking of violence?'

"'No, I am thinking of peaceful methods, though we hav, as a nation, been fearfully taught that the violence is inevitable if right is crushed. The wrong must be exposed, the evil must be traced to its roots, the public sentiment must be educated, the public conscience must be aroused. In the artificial complications of our civilization, men do not find it easy to detect the germ of the vast iniquity. They are blinded by interest, by tradition, by falsehood. If a man robs another on the highway, we call it crime, and send the culprit to prison. If a railway manager steals millions by the well-known device of "watering stock," that is no crime—it is financiering. If a corporation, in the wantonness of power, reduces the wages of a thousand men, and exposes five thousand souls to starvation, we clothe the outrage in the euphemism of—overproduction.

"'The press is as helpless for good. A journal stands for the interests of its party; or, if it claims to be independent, it mainly reflects the current opinion—it cannot afford to be entirely just to an unpopular idea. The press never leads in a movement of radical reform.

"'The pulpit has exposed itself to a stronger condemnation. If judged by the standard of the Sermon on the Mount, how many of the maxims recognized in society, how many methods of business or systems of industry, could stand the test? Yet where is the pulpit which ventures to attack the prejudices or interests of the pews? When it touches social questions it is more liable than otherwise to deal ignorantly or deceitfully with them. One clergyman had this to say: "I do not see how a man who is able to make two million dollars while I hav made only a thousand, wrongs me in any way." If it were possible for the wildest fancy to conceive that one man, however able, could honestly earn two thousand dollars while another, however incapable, was earning only one dollar, it would task a superhuman imagination to dream that one man could earn two millions in a lifetime. If the pulpit will thus defy common sense, how can it aid in human advancement?'

"'Then if no help can be expected from these sources, what is your hope, Mr. Bowditch?'

"'It is in the sublime fact that human nature gravitates toward goodness and truth. That is the secret of all progress. It is the intangible moral force behind all reform. Through the force of his moral instincts man has risen out of barbarism and superstition, in spite of popes and priests, in spite of kings and standing armies, in spite of prejudice and the power of wealth.'

"'Will it not yet be a long time to wait, Mr. Bowditch?'

"'But we hav already gained something in our great conflict of emancipation. At first, the Abolitionists were as one against ten thousand; but in thirty years they revolutionized the sentiment of the country. The lesson is our inspiration. We rejoice not alone that millions of slaves were set free; the richer fruits of the victory were seen in the overthrow of that power which, intrenched in government and church, and defended by political parties and the press, deemed itself invincible. The new power—the monopoly power—which, in the confusion following the war, rushed in to rebuild the demolished throne, cannot make so long a battle. And the issue is almost identical. "Justice to the producer!" is a war-cry that does not differ in meaning from "Liberty to the slave!"'"

While "The Dawning" is not an "Uncle Tom's Cabin" in its power to arouse the mind, it certainly is a work of unusual merit as a novel, with the additional virtue that it may set its readers to thinking. Beacon Hill and Fifth avenue will be instructed by a thorough digestion of its contents.

INFIDEL DEATH-BEDS. By G. W. Foote. London, Eng.: The Progressiv Publishing Co. Pp. 64. Price, 25 cents.

This excellent work confutes the Christian fabricated accounts of the horrors of Infidel death-beds. Some years ago the Rev. Erskine Neale published in England an extensiv collation of such Christian campaign lies under the title of "Closing Scenes," which was long popular and influential; but its falsity was finally exposed, and it fell into disrepute. However, these falsehoods are still activly circulated by preachers and religious papers, and probably half the population of this country would, if questioned on the subject, be found contentedly confident that all dying Infidels shriek so they can be heard blocks away. Mr. Foote givs the facts of the manner of death of scores of eminent Infidels, of whom a few are: Lord Amberley, Lord Bolingbroke, Bruno, Buckle, Carlile, Condorcet, Danton, Diderot, George Eliot, Frederick the Great, Gambetta, Gibbon, Goethe, Hobbes, Hugo, Hume, Martineau, Mill, Mirabeau, Paine, Shelley, Spinoza, Strauss, Volney, and Voltaire. Mr. Foote, among many valuable thoughts on the subject, remarks:

"For my own part, while I hav known many Freethinkers who were steadfast in their principles in death, I hav never known a single case of recantation. The fact is, Christians are utterly mistaken on this subject. It is quite intelligible that those who believe in a vengeful God, and an everlasting hell, should tremble on 'the brink of eternity;' and it is natural that they should ascribe to others the same trepidation. But a moment's reflection must convince them that this is fallacious. The only terror in death is the apprehension of what lies beyond it, and that emotion is impossible to a disbeliever. Professor Tyndall, while repudiating Atheism himself, has borne testimony to the earnestness of others who embrace it. 'I hav known some of the most pronounced among them,' he says, 'not only in life but in death—seen them approaching with open eyes the inexorable goal, with no dread of a hangman's whip, with no hope of a heavenly crown, and still as mindful of their duties, and as faithful in the discharge of them, as if their eternal future depended on their latest deeds.'"

"God and His Book," Part III., has just been brought out by Stewart & Co., London, Eng. It is written by the old favorit of Freethought readers, "Saladin." A new book by this author is a rich treat. He possesses a depth and accuracy of learning which is of the greatest service in exposing Bible errors, while his style is exceptionally fascinating. His serious passages hav a vividness and vigor of language not unworthy of Carlyle, and his lighter pages are in their humor and wit quite irresistible. In this book he addresses the Lord in the first person, after a fashion of which this may serve as a sample:

"You are, no doubt, in some respects, a very good God. I hav a lingering apprehension that your book makes you much worse than you are, and that, if the said book were competently corrected, you would appear in your true light, and command the respect of all of us. Your careless and unrevised writing has done you incalculable injury. I hav heard—likely so hav you—of a Georgia merchant who, a short time ago, received the following order from a customer: 'Please send me one dollars worth of coffy, and one dollars worth of shoogar, some small nales. My wife had a baby last nite, also two padlocks and a monkey rench.' Through her husband's careless composition this American woman was represented as bringing forth not only a baby, but two padlocks and a monkey-wrench! I apprehend it was some similarly inadvertent writing on your part, O Lord, that has given the impression that a virgin bore you a son by the Holy Ghost. I am sure you never would hav given such an impression in your sane senses and with time to revise. I suspect I, even I, hav had experiences somewhat similar to yours. A good many years ago I wrote, 'This is Palm Sunday.' The compositor set it up, 'This is Sam Lundy.' I felt irritated, and wrote on the margin of the proof, 'Who the deuce is Sam Lundy?' To my horror, when, next morning, I saw the impression which had been thrown off, a certain sentence ran, 'This is Sam Lundy.—Who the deuce is Sam Lundy?' You, O Lord, in that extraordinary book of yours, must surely hav suffered from this sort of thing.

"O holy Lord! where were you brought up? Your son was born in a stable; and, if you were brought up in one, I must excuse you for the lack of refinement and even decency which characterizes much of your book. To tell you the candid truth, your book is obscene. I could point you out passage after passage, ad nauseam, which would incontrovertibly establish my assertion. But, if I were to do so, my book would be nearly as nasty as yours; and, although it may not shock the feelings and injure the reputation of a god to write an obscene book, it would shock the feelings and injure the reputation of any ordinary human author, including the one who at present, with so much candor, addresses you.

Ingersoll's Lectures Complete.
Bound in one volume. To meet the demand for Mr. Ingersoll's works, the publisher has had all his lectures, except the latest on "Ortho-doxy," bound in one beautiful volume, in half calf, library style, and containing over 1,300 pages, which is sold at the exceedingly low price of $5. Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "Tribute to His Brother," "The Vision of War," the "Grant
Banquet Toast," and the recent address over
"Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the four will be forwarded to any address, for 50cts, or either one for 15cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it.
Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, $7.50; in full tree

Practical Experience with Poultry.
By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only
"a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

OF
BY LEWIS G. JANES.

This book treats of the natural evolution of the Christian religion, its historical antecedents in Palestinian Judaism and Roman Paganism; investigates the history of the founder of Christianity in the light of the latest scientific criticism of the New Testament; shows that the true story of the Man Jesus, and his genuin teachings are separable from the later legendary accretions which hav confounded him with the mythical Christ, and traces the natural development of Christian dogma and ecclesiastical institutions. Complete references and full index. 320pp. 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price $1.50.

THE popularity of cremation in Germany is rapidly increasing.

LEGAL prohibition in Ohio is to be opposed by a state organization of temperance advocates, who rely on moral suasion to check the evils of dram-drinking.

ON the Home Rule question it is thought that some compromise will be found in the way of extending large measures of local government to Ireland.

THE noted New York politician, Peter B. Sweeny, who has recently returned from Europe, reports such discontent and revolutionary tendency among the people of every country in Europe as to justify expectations of immediate outbreaks and wars.

THE power that is most activ in enforcing the R. I. Prohibitory law is the Republican party, the cause being its desire for Prohibitionists' votes.

TWO eminent European Socialists, Mr. Aveling, of England, and Herr Liebknecht, of Germany, are in this country agitating in favor of Socialism.

ON Sept. 25th four boycotting cigar-makers were arraigned in a United States court at Buffalo, N. Y., for conspiracy, and will be tried in November.

AT the recent departure of the Salvation Army from Fishkill, N. Y., four young girls left their families and ran away with male members of that organization.

HENRY GEORGE will formally accept the nomination for mayor of this city on the 5th, and will commence an activ campaign, with frequent public addresses and a liberal distribution of campaign literature. Some politicians view his rivalry with dismay, but the majority contemptuously predict the usual defection at the polls of expected labor-reform voters.

A FALL-CRICK VIEW OF THE EARTHQUAKE.

I kin hump my back and take the rain,
And I don't keer how she pours;
I can keep kind o' ca'm in a thunder-storm,
No matter how loud she roars;
I hain't much skeered o' the lightnin',
Nor I hain't sich awful shakes
Afeared o' cyclones—but I don't want none
O' yer dad-burned old earthquakes!

As long as my legs keeps stiddy,
And long as my head keeps plumb,
And the buildin' stays in the front lot,
I still can whistle some!
But about the time the old clock
Flops off'n the mantel shelf,
And the burro skoots for the kitchen,
I'm a goin' to skoot myself!

Plague take! ef you keep me stabled
While any earthquakes is round,
I'm jist like the stock—I'll beller,
And break for the open ground!
And I 'low you'll be as nervous,
And in jist about my fix,
When yer whole farm slides from under you,
And on'y the mor'gage sticks!

Now, cars hain't a-goin' to kill you
Ef you don't drive 'crost the track;
Creditors never'll jerk you up
Ef you go and pay 'em back;
You kin stand all moral and mundane storms
Ef you'll only just behave—
But a' EARTHQUAKE—well, ef it wanted you,
It 'ud husk you out o' yer grave!—Puck.

IN A DIME MUSEUM.

And there was the living skeleton—the anti fat man (after taking)—a kind of phantom, a sort of animated ramrod or bone knife, with the edge always toward you. He could sleep comfortably in a floor crack, or crawl through a gas pipe without touching the sides. He couldn't go out on a windy day without an anchor. This was the idea I got from the canvas. But of course it wasn't quite as bad as that, for I learned afterward that the skeleton man was simply an ex-Methodist country preacher.

He had feasted for ten mortal years on "donations."

When I first saw him his bones had quit showing through the skin. This despite the fact that his fare was limited to pickles three times a day, with vinegar. Still this rich diet impaired much of his usefulness, even for a preacher. When I got familiar with him I became a favorit. When Elder Pickles leaned up against me for exercise he made a deep impression on me.

Or crease rather.

"Jim, my boy," he once said, dubiously, with a shake of the head, "if this thing goes on [referring to his growing size], I'm afraid—I'm afraid"——

"Afraid o' wot, Pickles?" I inquired.

"Afraid I shall hav to go to preaching again. A year or two on donations would just fix me."

"Never mind, Pickles," I replied; "I tell yer wot you do if yer don't want to get above yer size."

"What is it, Jim?"

"Start er religious book s-t-o-r-e."

"That ain't a bad idea, Jim," he responded, "but that might overdo it."

"Well, then, start out ter collect a millyun dollars for a monyerment, and don't eat nuthin' till yer get the first dollar."

"That also might bring me down too fine, Jim."

"Take a steerage passage to Liverpool, then—or put up at a fashionable boarding-house. I say, Pickles, if yer really want ter see yer own bones again, take out a patent on perpetual motion and try ter make her work."

"All excellent suggestions, Jim," replied the elder; "but I think I'd better go to preaching and try to build a church. That'll keep me down, I guess."

"Betcher life it will, Pickles!" I ejaculated, with feeling.

Whenever the elder gave me his hand to take a walk I always felt as if I were handling edged tools.

a public library, or non-exthe circle where a thinker is born, will forward his thinking or obstruct and prevent it. . . . The futility of founding universities at this time is obvious. The only university you can advantageously found were a public library. This is never out of season: therefore, not now.—Carlyle.

FOR the pleasure and delight of knowledge and learning, it far surpasseth all other in nature, for shall the pleasures of the affections so exceed the senses as much as the obtaining of desire or victory exceedeth a song or a dinner; and must not, of consequence, pleasures of the intellect or understanding exceed the pleasures of the affections? We see in all other pleasures there is satiety, and, after they be used, their verdure departeth, which showeth well they be but deceits of pleasure and not pleasures, and that it was novelty which pleased and not the quality; and, therefore, we see that voluptuous men turn furious and ambitious princes turn melancholy. But of knowledge there is no satiety, but satisfaction and appetite are perpetually interchangeable, and, therefore, appeareth to be good in itself simply, without fallacy or accident.—Lord Bacon.

ON looking over the world the cause of nine parts in ten of the lamentable failures which occur in men's undertakings, and darken much of their history, lies not in the want of talents or the will to use them, but in the vacillating and desultory mode of using them, in flying from object to object, in starting away at each little disgust, and thus applying the force which might conquer any one difficulty to a series of difficulties so large that no human force can conquer them. The smallest brook on earth, by continuing to run, has hollowed out for itself a considerable valley to flow in. The wildest tempest overturns a few cottages, uproots a few trees, and leaves, after a short space, no mark behind it. Commend me, therefore, to the Dutch virtue of perseverance. Without it all the rest are little better than fairy gold, which glitters in your purse, but when taken to market proves to be slate or cinders.—Carlyle's Letters.

WOMEN are by nature more excitable than men—prone to be swept by tides of emotion proceeding from hidden and inward, as well as from obvious and external, causes; and female education does its best to weaken every physical counterpoise to this nervous mobility—tends in all ways to stimulate the emotional part of the mind and stunt the rest. We find girls naturally timid, inclined to dependence, born conservativs; and we teach them that independence is unladylike, that faith is the right frame of mind, and that, whatever we may be permitted, and, indeed, encouraged, to do to our brother, our sister is to be left to the tyranny of authority and tradition. With few insignificant exceptions, girls hav been educated either to be drudges or toys beneath man, or a sort of angel above him. The possibility that the ideal of womanhood hes neither in the fair saint nor in the fair sinner; that the female type of character is neither better nor worse than the male, but only weaker; that women are meant neither to be man's guides nor their playthings, but their comrades, their fellows, and their equals, as far as nature puts no bar to that equality, does not seem to hav entered into the minds of those who hav had the conduct of the education of girls.—Huxley's Lay Sermons.

MOSES had been an Egyptian priest, and the unity of God was a fundamental article of that religion. The unity of God was also the tenet of the more intelligent inhabitants of the desert. Whether, therefore, we regard that great man as an Egyptian or an Arab, it can scarcely be doubted that the views which he held of the deity were as truly unitarian as those of Mohammed or Abdul-Wahhal. It is, however, quite certain that to the people whom he led Jehovah was merely an invisible Bedouin chief who traveled with them in a tent, who walked about the camp at night, and wanted it kept clean; who maneuvered the troops in battle; who delighted in massacres and human sacrifice; who murdered people in sudden fits of rage; who changed his mind; who enjoined petty larceny and employed angels to tell lies; who, in short, possessed all the vices of the Arab character. He also possessed their ideal wishes, for he prohibited immorality and commanded them to be hospitable to the stranger; to be charitable to the poor; to treat with kindness the domestic beast and the captiv wife.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

ALL of us who are worth anything spend our manhood in unlearning the follies or expiating the mistakes of our youth.—Shelley's Letters.

ROBBING THE FAMILY TO FEED DRONES.

Notes and Clippings.

In consequence of the objections of the religious people of Birmingham to the employment of Christians in the free library on Sunday, a number of Jews hav been engaged as attendants.

At Birmingham, Eng., recently, William Nokes, a captain in the Salvation Army, was charged with deserting his wife and family, who had in consequence become chargeable to the parish. When arrested he said he had been serving the Lord, and while he was doing that somebody else must look after his wife and children, as he had no time for such matters. On being sentenced to a month's imprisonment with hard labor, he called out loudly, "Praise the Lord for all things; that is what I wish!" He was removed shouting, "Praise the Lord!"

During a sermon in the cathedral last night against the public schools, Rev. Father Kearney is reported as saying that these institutions "are for paupers of the city." True, the poorest child is admitted to the public schools, but on an equality with the richest, and the blackest child on an equality with the whitest, the Jew with the Christian; and that catholic quality of equal rights for all classes, creeds, and conditions is one of the great virtues of the public school system, which Father Kearney admits. But Father Kearney objects that the public schools afford only secular, worldly education. True, but as the masses are to be fitted for secular pursuits and not for the priesthood, secular education is necessary to their welfare, and without some measure of worldly welfare the individual in the present state of society makes but a sorry Christian.—Pittsburgh Penny Press.

Since 1884 there hav been constructed in Rome over thirty-two edifices for monks and nuns at a cost of something like $6,000,000. In addition, the Jesuits hav during the past twelve months purchased a large number of buildings already completed, among which is included the well-known Hotel Constanzi, and its appurtenances, which alone cost $1,000,000. One of the best-known architects in the city has received orders to superintend the erection of four great ecclesiastical colleges, one of which is for American Catholic students.

Russia is peculiarly rich in surprising sects and associations, but the most astounding is one lately brought to light bearing the ominous title of "The Red Death." Its members affect to believe that he who consciously permits another to suffer prolonged pain commits a mortal sin. In order to abbreviate the sufferings of humanity it is a matter of conscience with them to kill the sick, that they may be put out of their pain quickly. The association takes its name from the fact that its executioners, dressed in red for the occasion, strangle their victims with a red cord, placing them for the purpose upon a red catafalque, beneath the dull reddish light of an oil lamp. This strange and horrible association was brought to light by the energetic opposition interposed by a man in Saratoi when his mother and sister endeavored to strangle his sick wife. He called in the authorities, who hav already arrested some forty members of the murderous sect. Their organization seems to be a transference from India to Muscovite soil of the worship of Bohwanee, the religion of the Thugs.

M. de Mortillet, well known for his researches on primitiv man, and Radical deputy of Seine-et-Oise, as mayor of St. Germain has decreed that all municipal officials shall send their children to the municipal schools on pain of dismissal. He is so convinced of the excellence of secular education, says the Times correspondent, that he will not allow the parents under his rule the option of Catholic schools. If M. de Mortillet were a Catholic and would not allow Secularists the privilege of selecting the schools for their children, he would be called a bigot.

The recent revision of the Bible has done much to shake the faith of the younger Nonconformists of England. An eminent Nonconformist thus explains it: "The late Thomas Carlyle remarked that Dean Stanley was, as usual, boring holes in the bottom of the Church of England; but the dean never bored half so big a hole in the church's bottom as he did in the bottoms of the dissenting sects when he procured their coöperation in that great work of the Bible revision. The Bible was the one great Christian tradition to which they clung. Practically they regarded it as a thing fallen from heaven with every word and stop complete; but by the Bible they meant the English version. 'Where you do open un,' said an old Dissenter once to me, 'there read un.' But now where is this old belief? As strong as ever possibly among the elder ones, but what about the young? How can the doctrin of verbal inspiration stand in the presence of a parallel New Testament with two different texts ranged side by side? The Wesleyans find their favorit passages grievously transmogrified with 'Turn again,' or 'Turn,' for 'Be converted.' The Baptists find one of their loci classici removed to the margin, and another seriously maimed."

The Rev. Jo. Cook is a bawling mountebank, whose advocacy of any cause is enough to condemn it, and whose opposition to any cause is prima facie evidence that the cause is worthy of the support of respectable men. "I say come on with your schemes of confiscation and forced loans," screams this reverend blatherskite from his perch in Tremont Temple; "come on with your graded income taxes and irredeemable currency, under universal suffrage, and if you are sufficiently frank in proclaiming the doctrins of your ringleaders, then, under military necessity, and even here in the United States, we must get rid of universal suffrage, and we shall! Rather than allow these things we shall hav one of the fiercest of civil wars." "We," Jo Cook and his tongue—combination everlasting of brass and leather—propose to do wonders if the world holds out. But why, Jo Cook, do you yell at Anarchists for wishing to overthrow a government that displeases them, and with that same unruly mouth of yours proclaim your intention of overthrowing the government if it displeases you? You aberrant and enormous ass, what do you mean by your dithyrambic debacchation? You conductitious windbag of podagrous Plutus, who do you think you are?—Winsted Press.

Communications.

The Church and its Influence.

Draper says Latin Christianity is responsible for the condition of Europe from the fourth to the sixteenth century. The church has always claimed that the world was indebted to her for its morals; yet the historian informs us that at one time in England there were one hundred thousand women made dissolute by the clergy. The idea of the church being a great moral teacher can hardly be reconciled with its insatiable lust for gold. The methods of the church hav been reduced to a perfect system for profit and plunder. For gold she has sold licenses for the commission of the blackest crimes, murder included, while Christianity held all Europe under sway, when the happiest results should hav been looked for. The people lived in rude huts, which would not now be considered fit for our domestic animals. Men, women, and children slept in the same room, and dogs, fowls, and pigs were frequently joint occupants. Their houses are described as "dens of pollution, swarming with vermin." Their food consisted of black bread and the coarsest vegetables, and even the barks of trees. Their clothing was frequently wisps of straw twisted or tied around the body. Human flesh was sometimes cooked and sold in the market. Epidemics were frequent, and the death-rate terrific. In 1258 fifteen thousand died in the city of London.

The poor had no medical treatment except holy relics and shrine cures. In every part of Europe offices were filled with ecclesiastics, who were noted for voluptuousness and gluttony. There was a double government—a local government and a church government, the local government always dominated by ecclesiastics. The revenues of the local government rarely equaled the revenues of the church; church dignitaries vied with each other in regard to the number of slaves they possessed. The country swarmed with beggars, while a vagabond clergy strolled from place to place with indulgences and holy relics, sucking up what little remained of the people's substance. All ambition for learning died out. There were no schools except for the education of church dignitaries. The church, instead of educating the people, depended on their ignorance for its revenues. Ignorance was believed to be the mother of devotion—and a devoted class they were, but not to the interests of human kind.

No attention was paid to highways. Journeys could not be safely undertaken. Every swamp and forest was thronged with Christian highwaymen. The robber would insist that the victim should say his prayers before having his throat cut. How could there be safety when the church was selling indulgences for theft and robbery? Such crimes were not as likely to be punished as heresy. Travel consisted mostly in pilgrims straggling to shrine or sacred relic.

Prayers of the priests were depended upon to keep epidemics from cities reeking with filth. The general ignorance was such that the people believed that the prayers of the priests could influence the weather and deliver them from impending calamities.

At one time a peculiar disease broke out among the people. It raged with great virulence, and went from the highest church dignitary to the lowest beggar. Shrine cures and holy relics failed to reach the case. Ecclesiastics laid it to a certain taint in the atmosphere. Certain it is that if the clergy had been faithful to their vows of chastity they would not hav been reduced to the most loathsome objects, as thousands of them were.

The relic business was carried to the most ludicrous extent that could be imagined. The savior's crown of thorns was on exhibition at many different places at the same time. Spears which pierced his side were on exhibition at numerous places. In short, such was the power of the priesthood and such the ignorance of the people that their money could be extorted with anything which had the smack of sanctity.

Much of the property belonged to the church, which recognized no law except its own enactments. It virtually held the power of life and death over the people. Places were given to those who would do the most for the church. Though Christianity had its origin among the meek and lowly, the poor no more expected preferment than so many swine. Bribery and fraud were practiced without a blush. Licenses, indulgences, and places were in the market, and at any time to be had for money.

The clergy joined in the hot scramble, and thought only of turning their spiritual ministries and sacraments into profit. Purgatory was becoming depopulated on account of indulgences. The church had become a monarchy, and the Inquisition rendered its power irresistible. To oppose the church was to meet death by fire. The more the church grew in power the more atrocious it became.

To be accused was equal to a death-warrant. One was not allowed even to know the name of his accuser, nor could he hav any legal adviser. He was tortured on suspicion. The Inquisition never learned to pity. The family of the accused was disgraced and ruined, and his property confiscated to enrich the church. Places in the church were sold at auction. Priestly robes were only covers for wickedness.

The priest was the real ruler of the household. At every marriage, birth, and death the services of the priest were indispensable. There was but one policy, and that was the aggrandizement of the church. The individual, the family, and the state were swallowed up by the church. Nothing was done to advance civilization, or ameliorate the condition of the masses.

For more than a thousand years Europe did worse than to stand still; she actually went backward. Every attempt at intellectual development was throttled, until the people became as ignorant as beasts. At one time it was estimated that ninety per cent of the people could not write their own names. Ignorance, insufficient clothing, filth, improper food, and inadequate shelter brought their harvests of pestilences. Our population doubles in about twenty-five years. Under Christian rule the population of Europe did not double in a thousand years. During these years of poverty, pestilence, and death never did the world see more magnificent churches; never were church dignitaries so fat and well-fed. While this was the condition of those favored by the church, thousands of the neglected poor lay on beds of sickness, with no physician or medicin except the mummery of the priest.

This condition of things throughout Europe should be taken as a fair test of the unopposed workings of ecclesiastical rule. During these centuries of ignorance and suffering the church was not only the power behind the throne, but the throne itself.

Such are the consequences of ignoring the useful and proper things of this earth and turning the sole attention to an imaginary kingdom; such the consequences of starving both mind and body to find favor with redeemers, Virgins, and dead saints; such the consequences of a belief in prayers, infallible ecclesiastics, revelations, Gods, Ghosts, supernatural remedies, holy relics, shrines, and miracles.

The secret of the despotic power of the church finds its root in the belief that God has written his will in a book which contains all the knowledge needful for man; that whenever a man acts differently from what is laid down in the book, he acts contrary to God's will, and therefore deserves hell—and forthwith the believers in the book proceed to administer it. Thus we are constantly drawn back as by the power of a magnet to the ignorance and superstition of three thousand years ago.

The effect is to rob a man of his independence, and put a quietus on human progress; in short, to forbid man ever to rise above the ignorant age in which his so-called "divine will" originated. This is demonstrated by the condition of Europe for more than a thousand years—held spell-bound by a dominant church and a designing priesthood.

If I am to be reduced to a state of ignorance and slavery, I care but little whether it is in the name of a devil or a reputed savior. Even the priests and ministers of to-day are not satisfied unless they are forging chains to enslave the mind. Somebody must be on his knees, or in tears, or at the confessional, or in a penitential mood. Some must be harassed with the fear of hell or the danger of losing heaven. Will men ever learn that their highest duty is to their kind, to make the most and best of this life? It is man, and not God, who most needs our help.

If we are doomed to hell, fretting over the situation will not help us. But it will be found in the end that he will get the most hell and do the least good in the world who frets the most about the danger of losing heaven.

The baleful influence of the church cannot be better exemplified than in the conquests of Mexico and Peru by the Christian Spaniards. They overthrew a heathen civilization and planted Christianity in its stead. But, O ye lovers of justice and humanity, witness the change! These countries were ruined by these Christian conquerors—plunged into anarchy and finally reduced to slavery.

Whichever way the murderous columns were headed, they were preceded by the cross. The priest and the crucifix were necessary appendages to every plundering expedition. At the behest of the minions of the church these unoffending nations were robbed of incalculable treasure, most of which ultimately found its way into the coffers of the church.

In the name of God they murdered these helpless people until the country was deluged in blood and the soil made rich with decaying carcasses. Such acts of brutality, such deep-laid plans of treachery, all in the name of heaven, are recorded on but very few pages of history.

These Christian conquerors found a people well up in learning and the arts; rich in agricultural products and mineral wealth; with a government well adapted to their advanced condition—a free and independent people. In the name of God, and through he instigation of the supporters of the church, these empires were overturned. All that remained of these advanced peoples and fertil and prosperous countries were blood, bones, ashes, and slavery. But they found them heathen—they left them Christian. Of course, in the sight of the Christians' God one ignorant, bloodthirsty Christian is of more consequence then ten thousand intelligent, prosperous heathen.

When the art of printing was introduced, of course the church must manifest its blind stupidity as usual.

When it is considered that millions of Bibles are printed and distributed by the church; that every Christian denomination has its papers and periodicals; that religious books, pamphlets, and tracts are as plenty as snow-flakes in winter, one would think that the church would hav hailed the art of printing as the greatest blessing to the race. Not so. The early printers were denounced by the church and accused of being in league with the devil, and for a long time no book could be printed without a permit from the church. Before a book could be published it must be duly examined by a certain number of clergymen and a certificate obtained that it was a godly and orthodox book. For years nobody dare publish a book, under heavy penalties, without a license from the church.

Learned societies were discouraged and even suppressed by the church. Some of those societies began to apply the same rigid rules to the dogmas of the church that they did to the investigation of other matters. The church had nothing to rely on but the Bible and miracles. Such proof did not satisfy the societies, and to settle the difficulty the church suppressed the societies—one as late as 1657.

When science began to teach that ill-ventilated houses, improper food, filth and dirt, were bids for pestilences, the church replied that "pestilences were visitations from God for the sins of the wicked."

Any attempt to palliate the sufferings and improve the condition of woman was looked upon as a crime. It was asserted that God had pronounced a curse upon her, and to alleviate her pains and smooth the rugged road which she was called to travel was to thwart the will of God.

When better houses, better food, and cleanlier raiment began to giv longer life and better health, the church claimed that man was becoming vain and puffed up with pride, and that his vanities and luxuries found no parallel in the life of the meek and lowly savior, and to fare better than he was to expose them to the dangers of hell. A pair of leather breeches worn for years without cleansing, often greased to keep them from chafing, then plentifully perfumed to neutralize the unpleasant odor, was far more acceptable to the average Christian than garments which could be easily washed and often changed. The theory seemed to be that the more a Christian stunk on earth the happier he would be in heaven.

Up to the sixteenth century, and even later, it was a cardinal doctrin of the church that it was wicked to hav any enjoyment; that the life of Christ was a scene of suffering; that he was a man of sorrows; that the more men suffered the more they were like Christ and the surer they were to meet him at the right hand of God. This world counted as nothing—it "was all a fleeting show." "Dark and stormy is the desert through which pilgrims make their way" was the burden of the Christian song.

Men tortured themselvs by fasting and starving; smiles were regarded as the devil's wrinkles; sickness was believed to bring one nearer to God; in short, to liv decent lives and enjoy some degree of comfort was to forget God and serve the devil. The life of Blaise Pascal is a case in point, and it is a curious case to consider. One of the finest intellects that France ever produced had this suffering mania so impressed upon his mind by early church education that for years he lived on the coarsest fare, suffered every privation; even wore a leather girdle around him filled with little, irritating spikes until his body became a festering mass; and when the pain was not sufficiently acute he would push the spikes into the living flesh with his arms, to keep him constantly reminded of the sufferings of Christ. In short, to gain heaven he was for years committing a slow, painful suicide. The "Thoughts" of Pascal are a great treasure in the church to-day. He was one of the most acute mathematical reasoners of his day. France could boast of but very few families who were the mental superiors of the Pascal family. Yet such was the debasing influence of Christian teaching that they believed in ghosts, witches, shrine cures, demons, and all the rest of the silly trash to the end of the Christian chapter.

If Christian teaching could thus degrade and debase the first intellects of France, I ask the intelligent reader to ask himself what must hav been the condition of the ignorant masses. Is it any wonder that they depended upon priests, and prayers, and shrine cures, and that filth and disease mowed down their harvests of victims?

Finally it began to dawn upon the minds of a few of the more knowing that to produce better men there must be better conditions. Somehow, in spite of the teaching of the church that Christianity was the grand panacea for all the ills of life, it came to be partly understood that poverty, ignorance, and squalor were the hotbeds of crime and disease. It was only when the people began to doubt that plagues and pestilences were "visitations from God" that better conditions were sought for.

It is next to impossible for the people at the present time to understand how the masses, high and low, of that day were hedged in by the infernal hag of superstition.

In the year 1600, the same year that Bruno was burnt at Rome, a trick horse was put on exhibition. The horse was indicted and tried before a regular court, found guilty of being possessed of the devil, and sentenced to be burnt. And the sentence was actually executed.

The man who discovered the philosophy of the rainbow was put in prison and kept there until the day of his death. In his coffin he was brought before an ecclesiastical court and tried for heresy, and his body, with a lot of heretical books, was devoured by the flames. JOHN PECK.

The Victim Tells His Story.

It was in the month of November, 1884, that the ship Valiant, of Rajah Gauput Lingh, of Calcutta, arrived in the harbor of New York. I was on board that ship till she lay there for about a month and a half. The first cold wave of the month of December dissipated all my hopes of making the North my home, and I took steamer for New Orleans. There I stayed for eighteen months. Mr. Sol Stern, of the New Orleans Moss ginnery, and Mr. George Purves, of the sash factory, proved very good friends to me. I worked and lived very comfortably under their patronage. The editor of the Times-Democrat, Mr. Whitney, and the secretary and members of the Young Men's Christian Association, of that city, were very kind and hospitable. I used to pass my evenings and holidays in their pleasant company. They used to enjoy the information they received from me on the Hindoos and their beliefs. I hav also spoken there in public meetings, and occasionally contributed to the Times-Democrat. As soon as I went there I opened an account with the Germania Savings Bank of that place. The account is still running. On the face of all these facts, one of the Christians of Ocean Grove has been pleased to publish in the New York Sun of the 29th of last August that I had been stranded in New Orleans by missing my steamer for New York, and that I had appealed to a gentleman for a five-cent postage-stamp for a foreign letter. On reading the said issue of the New York Sun it will be seen that the Methodist has very ingeniously placed the story as if told by a stranger who had been at Ocean Grove to visit me. Now, this stranger was no other than Mr. Gopal Vinayak Joshee, of Bombay, who has been lecturing in the North and West, from San Francisco to New York. No sooner did I read the Ocean Grove version in the said issue than I wrote a letter to the editor of the New York Sun protesting against the false statement, but that gentleman has not been pleased to publish my letter. Mr. Joshee has never been to New Orleans as yet. We both left India in 1884 and took different routes; Mr. Joshee, via China and Japan, landed at San Francisco, and I, via Cape of Good Hope, at New York. We were thus separated for over two years, and were anxious to meet each other. In June last I found myself out of work on account of the destruction of the factory in New Orleans, and, summer being a dull season there, I came North with a view of meeting Mr. Joshee, as well as finding some situation. As soon as I arrived in Asbury Park I found something to do. Mr. M. S. Gould, the mayor of this place, has been very kind to me since our first visit. But the case is different with the people of Ocean Grove. One day while I was engaged in my work some three tall-hatted gentlemen approached me, and, looking at my dress and features, asked my antecendents, nationality, and beliefs. On hearing that I was a Hindoo, and an unconverted Hindoo, and that I had no faith in the so-called Christian missionaries in India, one of the three turned his back coldly on me and walked away, while the other two were still questioning and listening to me patiently. Subsequently I came to know that they were the pastors as well as the peace officers of the Ocean Grove combination of state and church, and that the first one was the president of the Ocean Grove Camp-meeting Association. On the Sunday following, while I was passing the Association office, the president, Dr. Stokes, called me and took me by the hand in the office room where some other gentlemen were sitting. He introduced me to them by the following significant sentence, "Here comes Bombay to make a bow to Ocean Grove," upon which I said that I am but a poor, insignificant Hindoo, still clinging to my old ancestral faith, and that I do not deserve the honor due to my country, nation, and religion. There again a short discussion took place, and when Dr. Stokes found that I was in no way to be moved he took me again by my arm and pulled me out of the office while yet I was talking to his associates. This was the second cold treatment, and I felt it very keenly. I quietly went home, and in that uneasy state of mind I wrote him a letter which I hope the United States press will ask him to produce before the public.

I hav not kept a copy of it. However, I will giv its substance as below: "That I hav not come to this country in search of any religious truth, and that the differences in point of religious beliefs are delusiv and of human origin; that ultimately there is to be a combination of all religions, languages, and nationalities; that, in order to facilitate and expedite that grand object of the supreme power, men hav to abandon all prejudices against race, creed, and color; that the Constitution of the United States and the Declaration of Independence are the corner-stones of the future superstructure of the unity of man in God, and that therefore, as an additional amusement to the visitors of Ocean Grove, I wish to open a Sanscrit school and a class of oriental philosophy, for which I hope you will not deny me the permission, and a lot for a temporary tent." Such, or nearly such, is the wording and meaning of my letter. I mailed it, and it was received by him the next day.

When I saw him again, he said that he had received my letter, and that it was full of nonsense. Meanwhile Mr. Joshee came to see me, and stayed with me for a fortnight. I showed him round in Asbury Park and Ocean Grove. One day, while we both were walking on the sea beach in our nativ costumes, two ladies greeted us, and asked what were our beliefs. When they heard that we were unconverted Hindoos, they said to each other that they would save two souls. They very earnestly asked us to follow them to their house, and we did so. They sang and prayed for us for about an hour, and then asked each of us separately how we felt. My friend said that he felt as usual, and myself the same. When their enthusiasm of saving the souls was over, we told them calmly that we were not in search of salvation or any religious truth. I then introduced Mr. Joshee as a lecturer, and asked them if they could get up any engagements for him. They very readily consented, and, with the usual generosity and promptitude of American ladies, they succeeded in getting up two engagements. When the lectures were delivered (one being on religion and the other on the social manners and the customs of the Hindoos), some of the ladies expressed opinions that, if such were the Hindoos and their faith, there was no necessity of sending missionaries, to India at least. This went to the notice of Dr. Stokes, who immediately sent word to the arranging ladies, Mrs. Inskip and Mrs. Brooks, that no more engagements should be got up for the unconverted Hindoos' lectures. The ladies communicated the message to us, and said that unless we should renounce the Hindoo faith they could do no more for us. We then bid them good-bye, and went home. Next day I went and saw some of the proprietors of the different hotels, and arranged a course of lectures for Mr. Joshee. The guests as well as the proprietors were pleased with the information they received of the foreign countries. Meanwhile Mr. Joshee received invitations from Saratoga and Rochester, N. Y., and when he left me I continued the same course. In nearly ten hotels at Ocean Grove and about fifteen in Asbury Park I spoke and gave parlor lectures. When this went to the notice of Dr. Stokes, he sent me word through John C. Patterson, police-justice, that, by my parlor lectures, I was undermining the beliefs of the Ocean Grove congregation, and that I should cease at once lecturing in Ocean Grove. I paid no heed to this message, inasmuch as I was taking the permission of the proprietor, and announcing my subject beforehand to the guests, as "Hindoos and Their Beliefs." The time of my lectures was always after 8 or 9 P.M., and so never encroached upon the time of their church services. Besides, I hav myself attended almost all the services, whenever I could find time, to hear their sermons and lectures in the auditorium, and when the services were over liberal-minded ladies and gentlemen hav always given me a shake-hand, and hav inquired about myself and my beliefs. I used to answer all their questions according to my convictions, and when they found that my statements differed from what they hav been taught to believe about the Hindoos, they seemed to be more interested, and my strange hat in the center naturally drew around a larger crowd. But this was never during their services nor inside their buildings.

However, Dr. Stokes did not like to see his followers speaking to an unbeliever, and often told them to go home. But when he found that his flock did not obey his mandates outside the church premises, he either sent his janitor or came himself to me and pulled me by my arm out of the crowd and told me to go home, and I silently walked away. Such scenes excited the sympathy and curiosity of the people the more, and almost every day successivly for four or five days, the people flocked round me and asked several questions on the religion, politics, and society of my country. I used to answer them all to the best of my knowledge and judgment. On the 18th of August last. J. C. Patterson, police-justice of Ocean Grove, pulled me by my arm from the crowd and put me forcibly into the ferry-boat and sailed me off across the lake to Asbury Park, saying that if I should be seen within the limits of Ocean Grove again I would be arrested and locked up. As I knew that I was committing no offense, but simply answering the questions asked by respectable ladies and gentlemen, next day, as usual, I went to Ocean Grove to hear the sermon in the auditorium. It being too early, I took a seat on one of the back benches and was reading the daily paper, when all on a sudden a police corporal approached me and said that the chief of police wanted to see me in the court. I immediately followed him and found that there were only three there. The corporal read me the warrant and then Justice Patterson read the two affidavits, one being that of one T. P. Summers and the other that of the janitor, whose affidavits were kept ready written. Dr. Stokes's affidavit (which I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER) was not read to me.

I denied all the charges, but immediately the commitment was written and handed over to the corporal without even reading it to me. I was simply told to follow the corporal. I quietly did so for fear of being handcuffed. I did not resist any procedure, and, therefore, escaped that disgrace. The stage was ready at the door, and it took me and my body guard to the railway depot. We got into the train, and in about two hours I was transferred from the pew of the auditorium to the lonely cell at Freehold jail, to undergo there, as I understood, thirty days' punishment at hard labor. The Freehold authorities who had seen me and heard me speak in Ocean Grove immediately came to visit me in jail, thus proving that the laymen of America are more religious than the church people of Ocean Grove. The judge, the sheriff, and the jailor all sympathized with me, and said that they would soon try to effect my release. They said that as soon as the papers of my case should be received from Ocean Grove I would be released. The Ocean Grove apostolic magistrates, however, detained the records for five days, and on the 24th forwarded them to Freehold. For five days my friends at Asbury Park did not know what had become of me. My particular friend and patron, Mr. M. S. Gould, the mayor of Asbury Park, came to visit me in the jail and offered to pay all the expenses for my release. Thus I was liberated on the 24th, before the news of my commitment for alleged blasphemy and obstructing religious services was published in the New York papers, after six days' imprisonment. Since then I hav been staying at Asbury Park. I applied for a copy of my record to the Ocean Grove authorities as well as to the Freehold authorities, but I received no reply from either. I am glad to see that THE TRUTH SEEKER has procured most of the documents, and thus has placed the truth before the grand tribunal of the press. I further hope that the public press of the United States will make a demand for the production of my letter to Dr. Stokes, and my reply to the New York Sun's correspondent of Ocean Grove, whose false statements I hav a reason to resent more than the treatment at the hands of the Ocean Grove pastors.

Dear sir, I do not wish to call upon my offenders to answer in the court of justice where only a few at the bar and the bench hav their yea or nay; I would be satisfied if the majesty of the united press of this grand republic should take up the case and discuss once for all whether such a combination of church and state should be allowed in the great future of this free country. One hundred such monopolies like Ocean Grove, of the different denominations of Christianity, will ignore the spirit of the Constitution of the United States, and the boasted freedom of thought and speech; and it will be seen that the physical slavery of the past will be replaced by the more lamentable spiritual bondage of the imperceptibly creeping future. The forthcoming annual Congress of the Secular Union should pass resolutions asking the United States Congress not to issue any more charters to clerical associations authorizing to build up towns where the characteristics of this free country shall be blotted out with impunity. These religious assemblies are to all interests and purposes speculativ bodies, their whole town being considered to be one church and its premises; they practice buying and selling right in the church, and yet they claim to preach the doctrins of Christ. It is strange that the selected and elected members of the Congress should be made perfect dupes by a handful of Bible sharpers. Not only hav they been allowed to build New Jerusalems, but also they hav been supplied with the rod of the magistrate as well as the counter of a bankrupt. They do not hesitate to pass the hat at the end of each service farce. It is no use bringing such people before the court for their rash acts, but it is necessary that no more such a combination of state, bank, and church be created or allowed to be created by the United States Constitution.

News and Notes.

A few words to the "printer's devil." The sins o- omission, I believe, are greater than those of comf, mission, and what will not the aforesaid individual suffer? His sins are great. I will explain that I did not say in the issue of Sept. 25th, in "News and Notes," from Cromwell, Ia., that Mrs. Truman was the sister of Mrs. A meda Green, but her daughter, and the sister of F. Q. Green. I wish thus to correct THE TRUTH SEEKER's roll of names.

So much for reminiscence. Forward again. Into the big city of Chicago I plunge; and a big city it is, and, like the Mormon's god, it is "growing bigger every day." It has changed wonderfully in the last twenty years. Here is where I studied theology, amid these roaring streets. I can scarcely comprehend the folly of that period of my life, when I was trying to "look up" and thought there was a God in heaven and that John Calvin was his next-door neighbor. I took a survey of the building where I wasted so much precious time. I might as well hav been in jail. Theology is a thief and robber. It lays its ghostly hand upon the golden moments and they become as nothing. If I had invested my little money in corner-lots instead of theology and Hebrew, I should to-day be a much richer and happier man. It was with melancholy disgust that I looked upon that prison-house of hope. and as I saw a few theological students flitting about, how I did pity their worthless apprenticeship to the trade of ignorance! I turned to the busy streets to look upon real men and women and take some consolation in the fact that I hav a few years left for this world.

Life in Chicago is much like that of New York. It is a whirl of immense and invigorating forces. Just now the Anarchists' trial is in the minds of all. It is one of those things that will not down, for principles of infinit importance are involved. If I can believe those in whom I hav the greatest confidence, a huge and terrible injustice has been done, and a deep and deadly blow struck at human liberty. According to the published statement of the mayor of Chicago himself, this has been so, for he says he did that which in England would hav dethroned Victoria. Has it come to this that the American people will allow such an abuse of power? The tone of the newspapers on this question is simply astounding. I almost think I am in Russia, and that these editors are writing at the dictation of the czar. The trial of the Anarchists has been simply a form of "lynch law." If they are hung, it will be by a "snap judgment." The jury was a vigilance committee. It was prejudiced from the beginning. The men on trial were presumed to be guilty, and in order to escape were obliged to prove their innocence. It makes my blood boil with indignation to see such a flagrant violation of all principles of justice and liberty. The verdict of the jury is an outrage and a disgrace. I do not see how any Liberal, when he thoroughly understands the circumstances, can defend it for a single moment. It is not the opinions of these men that are now involved, but the rights of these men, and so the rights of universal humanity, the rights of every citizen. These rights hav been trampled upon, and I, for one, utter my indignant protest against these despotic methods. I admire the splendid courage of Mr. Stevens, Mrs. Freeman, General Trumbull, and other friends here who hav defended these men's rights against a vast popular clamor. Mr. Stevens is totally opposed to the opinions of the Anarchists. He has fought them on the arena of intellectual debate. These men withdrew from the Secular Union because the Union was opposed to their methods. We do not defend the ideas of these men, but we do defend their rights, which are as sacred as our own. Mr Stevens and THE TRUTH SEEKER see this clearly. They pierce to the root of the matter. They stand exactly where Thomas Paine stood when he opposed the execution of the king. and was himse condemned to death for his bold attitude. Thomas Paine did not defend the ideas or methods of the king. He only labored in opposition to these; but he did recognize the sacred right in spite of all that he had done, and was entitled to justice; and the magnanimity of Thomas Paine was simply sublime. He braved the scaffold itself in order to defend the rights of his enemy. Let the Liberals of to-day follow that illustrious example; let them reread "The Rights of Man;" let them get at the real facts of this trial at Chicago, and understand, not that eight men with such and such opinions are on trial, but that the rights of man are on trial; that these rights hav been disregarded, and there is danger of the commission of a terrible crime, a judicial murder, to the disgrace of our country and to the joy of every ecclesiastical and political tyrant in the world. This has been a trial by theological and church methods. It is backed by the Christians and preachers, and the same methods, with a jury of clergymen like Rev. Blackwell, would hang every Infidel in the land. There will be no dissenting voice among Freethinkers when the facts are known, and I honor with all my heart the courageous and clear-sighted course of THE TRUTH SEEKER and Mr. Stevens and the Chicago Liberals almost to a man—and woman, too. The working people here are thoroughly indignant, and if these men are hung it will create an intense feeling, and the consequences will be simply incalculable. It is judicial blindness, madness, as well as crime, to hang these men. It will be an appalling tragedy. I believe that right in the focus of this trial is a great crisis for the American people. It is a combat of despotism with liberty.

I must express myself on this matter, for the deepest principles of our Freethought movement are involved. The issue cannot be evaded.

The world rolls on, however, and day and night mingle all along our path. Friday evening, September 24th, we had a pleasant sociable at the rooms of he Union, and I was glad to meet so many good friends—Mr. Stevens, Mr. and Mrs. Freeman and her daughters, Mrs. Foster and Mrs. Le Page, who are true inheritors of talent, Mr. Frankel, Mr. Card, Mr. Magie and daughters, Mr. and Mrs. Rivers, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Ostrom, of Nekoma, who came one hundred and forty miles to attend the lectures; Dr. Reynolds, who is eighty years old, and does not look over fifty—a good example that I mean to follow. What is the use of looking old, even if you hav to grow old? Others were present, and we had recitations, singing, etc., by Mrs. M. A. Freeman, Mr. Card, Mr. Frankel, etc. Miss Lizzie Magie gave her brilliant little poem entitled, "The Inquirer," published in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, and Mrs. Ella Le Page gave her sparkling anti-theological jeu d'esprit, "No Name," and Dr. Reynolds brought down the house with three rounds on his "Crow Song," and everything went off like the dancing, with musical vigor. I myself entered the entrancing circle and kept tune to the rippling notes, although I didn't always keep step. My feet, like my head, are not exactly orthodox, and will take a different turn from the rest of mankind.

I gave lectures Sunday afternoon and evening. In the evening the hall was full, and we had quite a lively discussion of the question presented, "American Democracy." It was participated in by General Trumbull, Dyer Lum, Mr. Simpson, Mr. Moore, Mr. Stevens, etc., and the ideas of each were vigorously expressed. There were differences of opinion, of course, as there should be among those who think for themselvs.

I was surprised and delighted to meet so many friends from afar off as I did at the Sunday meeting. Chicago is indeed the hub of the universe. Boston will hav to resign. Chicago is the true cosmopolitan center, where all the world does come. It waves Aladdin's wand and everybody is present.

Who did I meet first of all but George Maddocks, of Canada? And then right on his heels came Dr. Greer, of Utah; and then Dr. Jones, of Pennsylvania, now of Evanston; and then Mr. Newkirk, of Ludlow, Ill.; W. C. Howard, of Volo, and Dr. J. Howard, of McHenry, and their wives; and Mr. George, of Burlington, and J. W. Ward, of Postville, Iowa; and Mrs. Stella Campbell, of Butte City, Montana, and others whom I hav already mentioned; Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Ostrom, etc., of Nekoma, Ill., etc. Here were Montana, Utah, Pennsylvania, Canada, Iowa; and representativs from various parts of Illinois, all here in the Secular Union of Chicago, and I shall not soon forget this cordial gathering from so many places. I felt as if I was shaking hands with all the continent when I greeted these many friends.

In a place like Chicago, where everyone seems to hav his own method, and organizations are innumerable, the difficulties are great, but the Secular Union goes on in spite of all, and Chicago is a fighting-point that I like to visit. It is full of energy and electric movement. It is a focus of immense activities, and even amid the breath of opposition one finds the exhilaration of abundant life.

From Chicago I come to Belding, Mich. Here I find myself among wooded hills and green fields. and on the pleasant Platte river, which, summer and winter, pursues the even tenor of its way with but little deviation—never dry, and seldom flooded This is a good country, especially for wheat, and the farmers are prosperous. The buildings are elegant and substantial. Belding is just now having a boom. A silk manufactory is to be built, and this will help make it quite a lively little city, and the bow of promis arches its tumbling water power, which is one of the best in the state.

On Wednesday, in the cool and bracing atmosphere, I went with William Knott, of Belding, over to Grattan to see Converse Close, the patient philosopher, who has been confined for about fifteen years to his house, not being able to do any kind of work. Still he is bright and happy, for somehow nature puts its vitality into his life, and, in spite of weakness, the glory of the universal world is his, and with calm and radiant spirit he awaits all changes. The readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know him, for he has been a valuable contributor to its columns. He now writes discourses for the Secular Union of Belding. He must work so long as the flame lasts. He has been in this country over forty years, from its very start. He took the first load of wheat from here to Grand Rapids, for which he got forty-four cents per bushel, half in store pay. He was gone two days, and when he returned he had just five dollars and eleven cents left for his wheat and his work. Since then the same amount of wheat would hav netted one hundred dollars. Such hav been the hard times and the growth of the country. Mr. Close settled in Grattan before the country was organized, and when he wanted to be married there was no public officer to do it, so he had to employ the services of a justice in the adjoining county of Otisco. The jurisdiction of the justice only extended over Otisco county, while our friend wanted to be married in Kent county. Here was a matrimonial problem indeed. It was, however, solved. One beautiful July day, when the sun was shining in all its splendor, the marriage group and justice went down into the green woods, just by the county line, which was blazed upon the bark of the tall trees, and the justice stood upon one side of the line, in Otisco county, and the lovers on the other side, in Kent county, and thus amid this emerald temple, so magnificently decorated, was the unique ceremony performed, and for over forty years these two lovers hav walked together. About two years ago their neighbors, regardless altogether of any theological distinctions, celebrated the fortieth anniversary of their marriage, at which there was a large gathering, for none are more honored than Mr. and Mrs. Close, nothwithstanding their radical and outspoken views. If Mr. Close were member of a church, the Christians would certainly call him a saint for his fine and noble endurance of the ills of life, and so we will call him one of our saints, who, no longer in the activ world, is still a lofty spirit, confronting life and death with dauntless mind.

In Belding I find a Union strong in the quality of its membership, and certain of success. Mr. and Mrs. O. F. Webster, Mr. W. A. Knott and wife, Fred Van Vickle, Miss L. M. Smith, Chas. B. Ketchum and wife, Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Howe, Miss Ruth Moore, Mrs. Caroline Webster, and others, constitute the working element, and make a growing power for this world and its happiness I had the pleasure also of meeting friends from the vicinity—Mr. Elkins and Mr. Fuller, and their wives, from Grattan, who are subscribers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and so, of course, were like old acquaintances. They knew me and I knew them through the masonry of Freethought. Also Mr. and Mrs. Skellinger, of Smyrna, were present, and I hav had a cheering sojourn in this northland. The hall was full on the first evening, and literally packed on the second, and great interest was manifested in the subjects presented. This is where Reynolds did a splendid work last spring by awakening thought, especially by getting the Christians to read the Bible, of which, hitherto, they had been somewhat ignorant. They thought Reynolds had a Bible of his own, but they were soon convinced that it was exactly like the Methodist Bible, and thus their knowledge of scripture was increased. It will be seen that Reynolds is a good "Christian" missionary. Remsburg is coming here in November, and thus the fires of Freethought will be kept burning, and so with bright hope I leave this lovely village. Amid the smiles of nature shall wave the banners of liberty. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Blasphemer's Program.

On my return to New York city after the convention of the New York Freethinkers' Association, at White Sulphur Springs, I visited the district-attorney at Morristown, N. J. Mr. Cutler is a very candid, intelligent gentleman, and was naturally indignant at the outrage perpetrated on me by those pillars of the churches I had arrested at Boonton for inciting to riot and malicious destruction of my property, and no fears need be entertained that he will not do his full duty in securing them their just deserts. He informed me that the grand jury would sit on the second Tuesday in October, and most likely be discharged on the Friday or Saturday following, and that my trial would not take place till two weeks from date of the discharge of the grand jury.

I had the privilege to look over the district-attorney's law library, and found the law very clear and positiv on the crime of blasphemy. There is little possibility of my escaping indictment. Col. R. G. Ingersoll, who, with his characteristic chivalrous generosity and devotion to the cause of liberty, has pledged himself to defend me, expresses confidence that the trial at Morristown will be before an intelligent jury and that the case will be laughed out of court. In any other state than New Jersey or Delaware beyond doubt this would be so. But New Jersey bigots and fanatics are not apt to be jovial, nor to possess sufficient intelligence to appreciate a joke. New Jersey Christians, of whom the jury will be composed, are predisposed by nature and long habit to make egregious asses of themselvs, and to act the merciless fanatic with grim, owl-like solemnity—all for the glory of Jesus. But my dependence is in the great ability of my counsel and the intelligence of the Supreme Court, as beyond all question the statute law is contrary to the Constitution of New Jersey, as well as the Constitution of the United States.

I did all in my power while at Morristown to help the people there to an appreciation of truth and the need of investigation. I circulated twenty-five copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER with the "Pearls Before Swine" cartoon, which were eagerly received, and about five hundred leaflets of the Canadian Secular Union—No. 1, on "The Sabbath," and No. 3, on "Immortality."

September 15th I started for Camptown, Pa., to hold a promised tent-meeting, arranged for early in the season through the praiseworthy efforts of Mrs. Addie M. Reed. The meeting was delayed by the Christian mob of rioters at Boonton wrecking the tent.

Thanks to the generous friends who hav so kindly contributed to the tent and defense fund, I was enabled to purchase needed materials in New York, except center-poles, etc., which were provided by Hiram Elliott, one of the most highly esteemed and respected citizens of Camptown. With efficient aids, and by crowding two days' hard work into one, I was enabled to hav the tent pitched and in good order ready for Sunday morning, Sept. 19th. Once more the good cotton cathedral, dedicated to the gospel of humanity, was erect, and looked as neat and pretty as a young maid on her wedding morn. Of course the injury done by the severe strain of the fiber, alike warp and woof, by being wrecked at Boonton, N. J., cannot be remedied until after the damages are collected from the town of Boonton, with which I shall purchase a new top, but the rents and holes are very neatly repaired, so as to be scarce observable. New poles, new guys, and all are now in working order.

Sunday morning the dark clouds frowned, the rain dampened my expectation of an audience, and I retired to my room to work on my pamphlet of "Blasphemy and the Bible," for gratuitous distribution at Boonton and Morristown, N. J., but had scarce got well to work when that sturdy old veteran, J. S. Thomson, notified me I should hav to speak, for friends had come in from a distance, and despite "the clouds that lowered on our tent," there were nearly a hundred persons present; in the afternoon still more; and in the evening over one hundred and fifty, despite darkness, rain, and chilling cold.

Mr. R. G. Bolles walked in from Briney, nearly twelve miles, remained till after the evening lecture, and walked back, and repeated the arduous task four nights during the week and on the last Sunday. Thomas Peet, of Cold Creek, a gentle-hearted, snow-haired veteran of over seventy, came three miles on foot, every evening, regardless of cold, rain, dark, or mud.

The first four days' weather was bitter cold, dark, and rainy, yet the attendance and interest steadily increased. On Thursday Mr. and Mrs. Burrows, of Gibson, thirty-six miles' distance, arrived and remained to the close of the meetings. They are a united couple in all the very best the term implies —readers, independent thinkers, genuin Liberals, workers in word and deed. J. B. Overton, W. L. Vaughn, and Mr. and Mrs. M. G. Shoemaker came from Rush, and Dr. Knapp from Stevenville. I was much cheered and encouraged by their presence and kind words. Friday and Saturday was a shade warmer, and Saturday evening bright, clear starlight. Sunday, September 26th, was a gala day, despite the dark, threatening clouds which, like the fanatics' wishes of evil, failed to reach or hurt us. At 11 A.M. I spoke on organization and science schools on Sunday without special professional teachers, to about fifty persons, my words accompanied by the howling of the wind, the shaking of the tent, and flapping of the walls. But the agitation of the tent was nothing to the commotion of the Christians upon learning of the work accomplished—the organization of the Camptown Secular Society, with nineteen adult members. The following officers were elected: President, John Reed; vice-president, Mrs. Mary Barnes; secretary, Mrs. Addie M. Reed; treasurer, Hiram Elliott; vigilance committee, Nathan Brown, Chas. Slocum, Mrs. R. Shoemaker; educational committee, Mrs. J. S. Thomson, Mrs. D. L. Burrows, and Hiram Elliott; social committee, Nathan Brown, John Reed, Jr., and Addie M. Reed.

Monthly dues were by all promptly paid in advance. The regular meetings of the society and Sunday science school will be held every Sunday at 11 A.M., in Reed Hall, which was generously tendered to the use of the society by Mr. and Mrs. John Reed, with whom I found a most happy, comfortable home during my sojourn in Camptown. Despite their outspoken Infidelity, they are deservedly held in highest esteem, not only by all in the village, but throughout all the adjacent county. With such leading members as Mr. and Mrs. Reed and their noble sons John and Fred, Mr. and Mrs. Thomson, and Hiram Elliot, success is assured to the society.

Sunday afternoon we had nearly two hundred to listen to "Defense of Satan;" but for the dark, threatening clouds we should doubtless hav had three times that number. We closed the eventful tent season of 1886 to a very large attendance and great interest and enthusiasm. I spoke on "The Heaven of the Bible," and after the lecture answered many questions that much helped to send home conviction of the truth of Secularism to honest hearts.

After the lecture we took down the tent and packed it away, leaving it in care of our good friend John Reed, until the genial warmth of summer shall again prove the tent the very best possible means of propaganda work.

I left Camptown for North Parma on Monday, and shall enjoy home for a few days, the prospect of a possible two years' sojourn at Trenton making its happy freedom doubly enjoyable. I return to New York city on Monday. The Truth Seeker Company are getting out my pamphlet, "Blasphemy and the Bible," to be ready on my arrival in New York, so I can at once visit Boonton and Morristown, and personally distribute about fifteen hundred copies among the people. And then I prepare to face the terrors of New Jersey law, and answer for the awful crime of expressing my honest convictions in an orderly, gentle, and kindly manner, under my own tent, on a lot I had rented and paid for.

In the mean time I shall do all I can to help complete arrangements and insure success of the Congress of the American Secular Union.

Those desiring lectures during October, except 11th to 15th, will please write me at earliest date, care of Truth Seeker Company, 33 Clinton Place, New York.

Those desiring lectures by Mrs. F. C. Reynolds, during October and November, will please address Mrs. F. C. Reynolds, secretary N. Y. F. A., Box 104, North Parma, N. Y.

Arrangements for either of us to lecture at accessible places during October will be especially acceptable and much appreciated. C. B. REYNOLDS.

Wanderings.

September 1st found me speeding to our now thriving suburb, the Cream City, where a warm welcome always awaits me with Professor and Dr. Severance. The doctor's sister and mine were visiting Milwaukee and its exposition.

I made the acquaintance of Mr. V. G. Blatz, a sterling Liberal and wholesale confectioner, who is bondsman for Paul Grottkau, editor of the Milwaukee Arbeiter Zeitung, one of the ablest and best known German speakers in this country. Mr. Grottkau was formerly of the Chicago Arbeiter Zeitung, but left the editorial management of that paper when the followers of Most grew in ascendancy. He is indicted for inciting to riot, the indictment being based on the supposition that he spoke at a meeting where he was advertised; but as he never attended, you can imagin what a great case the state has. Mr. Grottkau is as much opposed to Anarchy as the writer, so what further idiocy the authorities will be guilty of remains to be seen.

After being refused admission to the House of Correction, when I demanded to see Frank Hirth, I took pains to hav the super-official forced to admit me the next day. My first recollection of Hirth was while editor of the Detroit, and later the Chicago, Socialist. Partially educated for the priesthood, he early repudiated his superstitious surroundings, enduring persecution for his vigorous denunciation of the crafty mind-muddlers. Formerly using acute reason, I am sorry to say he has been too chary lately of its exercise, and too largely devoted to the advocacy of destruction. His wrinkled brow, emaciated form, and hair prematurely gray all testify to severely activ mental work, and his sincerity in the cause he espoused. Our interview, with a turnkey within earshot, was necessarily formal and unsatisfactory. I am pained to learn that a few days thereafter, by great effort, permission was given him to visit, between guards, his dying wife, and thus as a felon bid her farewell forever. Such is ever the experience of all those who struggle for humanity. The world's saviors are crucified again and again. No one savior could rescue us from the deep damnation of barbarous injustice. Whether mistaken in his theories or not, had Frank Hirth devoted his time and talents to selfish purposes he would not now be at the mercy of his enemies.

A visit to Der Freidenker office disclosed the agreeable fact that that paper held identical views with THE TRUTH SEEKER on the Anarchist verdict in Chicago.

Why Racine was ever so denominated I could never determin, for the few French are from the Guernsey Isle, and partake of nothing dramatic. But there I met young Stillman (Dr. Severance's son) doing the heavy villain in a drama of the "Willow Copse" order in Renfrew's Pathfinder Company.

Returning to Chicago for the 6th, I attended the picnic, which Mrs. Freeman has so well reported that nothing further needs to be said.

So near Rochelle, I determined to pay a flying visit to the great scientific expounder and simplifier, Otto Wettstein, and was warmly greeted at his bazaar of blazing gems and collection of fine arts. His display far outshines anything one could reasonably expect in a town of that size. At his residence I had the pleasure of meeting Mrs. Wettstein, a lady of refinement and culture, characteristics of which the whole family partake. I am glad to know that the Freethinkers are appreciating his liberal dealing with them. I was sorry that a TRUTH SEEKER reader contemplated discontinuing on account of my letters on the trial and verdict. That was the only one which I heard of during my entire trip.

H. J. and Mrs. Scharfenberg I never miss calling on when in Davenport, Ia., for they are the Liberal workers of that place, ever ready to shoulder the larger portion of the burden, and having done heroic work in the past.

At Peoria, Ill., I made the acquaintance of A. A. Avery, whom the newspapers were hounding as an Anarchist, because he published a circular protesting against the Anarchist verdict. It was a bold, brave circular, and the papers said that they did not think he (Avery) could write it. I found him a very intelligent Liberal, and a follower of Karl Marx, the farthest remove from an Anarchist. He recognized me, having attended many of our Chicago meetings. Having had the freedom of Ingersoll's library when the colonel was a resident here, he is well equipped intellectually for the contest.

At Mrs. Helen Cellar's musical school, in Springfield, will be found nearly all Liberal papers in the country, nor is she afraid her pupils will be contaminated, as she leaves them convenient for their perusal.

Wm. Cook, an old friend of D. M. Bennett, and a countryman of mine, is also a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and we felt quite well acquainted.

Quincy would be the very last place I would wish to be found in were it not that I know some good Liberals there—Ernst Bertshinger, Captain Steinwedell, and Dr. Durant—who make life quite endurable and even hilarious. The Turners hav just completed a splendid hall at a cost of some $16,000. What a great organization for good could this become if it adopted the American language and methods! Efforts are being made to hav the English language used.

Robert Mulholland would be the man to whom you would be directed if asking for the leading Liberal of Bloomington, for he has figured in every good work of that character. Mrs. Mulholland, though a grandmother, will sit at the piano and sing you ballads by the hour in a voice that, like a violin, seems to hav lost none of its sweetness by age. Miss Mulholland partakes of her mother's poetic fervor, and has distinguished herself in song-writing.

S. P. Putnam's was the first familiar face I recognized when I landed in Chicago. Owing to illness, I was debarred from the full enjoyment of his whole-souled companionship, and must hav been a damper on his exuberance. Friday we had a reception and dance in his honor.

Sunday afternoon he lectured to a limited audience on "Universal Mental Liberty;" those who failed to attend lost an intellectual treat. Afternoon lectures are always indifferently attended here. The theme of his evening discourse was "American Democracy," when numerous hearers with frequent applause attested their interest in the subject, their approval of his position, and their personal regard for our genial secretary. Putnam has made many friends throughout this country, but none firmer than those of Chicago. The tenor of the remarks since his departure was one of universal regret.

Blasphemy and the Bible.

The Bible is claimed to be infallible, the inspired word of God, miraculously preserved and handed down to us in all its purity and perfection as our one only rule of religious faith and practice. We read: "All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works" (2 Tim. iii, 16, 17).

To question this is regarded as terrible wickedness; to simply imply a doubt will call forth fierce denunciations; to quote the Bible, showing its contradictions, will, in New Jersey, result in being mobbed, arrested for blasphemy, and being regarded as one in whom all goodness, truth, and virtue have ceased to exist.

"Truth has no respect for prejudice," says the Secularist. Prejudice has no respect for truth, declares the Christian bigot, and he quotes:

Though an angel from heaven preach any other gospel than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed (Gal. i, 8).

If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered; and men gather them and cast them into the fire, and they are burned (John xv, 6).

Deliver such a one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus (1 Cor. v, 5).

If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed (2 John x).

Such are the teachings of the holy Bible; such is the spirit it engenders among its devotees.

The idea that we are either to be saved by the scriptures or damned by them is prevalent in all the churches in Christendom. Believe or be damned (Mark xvi, 16).

If a perfect God gave mankind a revelation of his will, would not that revelation be as extensive as the demand which it was made to cover? This is self-evident. Yet millions upon millions of people have lived and died and never had opportunity to even hear of the existence of this holy Bible. Those who have it differ, quarrel, and make war with each other as to its teachings.

Christians express contempt for that mob in the city of Jerusalem who, when asked, "What evil hath this man done?" could only madly yell the words prompted by their priests, "Crucify him! Crucify him!" And to-day, as they recently proved in Boonton, New Jersey, they are themselves guilty of the same injustice, and are as blindly, slavishly obedient to the priests' dictation.

Is not the almighty God able to take care of and protect himself and his interests? Were the fanatics of Boonton justified in their fears that I would throw their God from his throne? Was it necessary to rally to his defense a howling mob with stones and jack-knives? Was it to the honor and glory of Jehovah to wreck my Tent, in the hope to thus prevent my destroying the Bible God?

The Boonton Christians are justified by the clergy, who claim the Bible should have entire control of all human affairs. True, their Bible invites us, "Come, let us reason together," but despite all reason Jersey law says "we must believe." Jesus says, "Believe or be damned." Science must yield to sanctity. Unqualified reverence and servile obedience to Bible teaching is the only way to attain respectability here or glory hereafter.

Christian reader, be honest in your answer. If the Bible is indeed God's word, should it not contain unmistakable evidence of the fact on its every page? Can that book be holy or of divine inspiration which gives such blasphemous representations of God as the Bible does? The Bible describes its God as unlimited in being, but yet limited to a personal existence; unlimited in goodness, yet allowing earthquakes, plagues, and famines to desolate the world he loves; a God of love, a tender, loving father, who gives evidence of possessing the heart of a fiend, reveling in murder, lust, and rapine; delighting in the butchery of babes, and the violation of virgins and ripping up of mothers; nourishing in his heart hate, anger, and vengeance. This God commands:

Go ye after him through the city and smite; let not your eye spare, neither have ye pity. Slay utterly old and young, both maids and little children and women (Ezek. ix, 5, 6).

Their children also shall be dashed to pieces before their eyes; their homes shall be spoiled and their wives ravished (Isa. xiii, 16).

Samaria shall become desolate, for she hath rebelled against her God: they shall fall by the sword: their infants shall be dashed in pieces and their women with child shall be ripped up (Hosea xiii, 16).

Then I will walk contrary unto you also in my fury: and I, even I, will chastise you seven times for your sins. And ye shall eat the flesh of your sons, and the flesh of your daughters ye shall eat (Lev. xxvi, 28, 29).

I will tread them in mine anger, and trample them in my fury, and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment, for the day of vengeance is in my heart (Isa. lxiii, 3, 4).

Is it possible to conceive more horrid blasphemy than this holy Bible contains? The Bible tells us of a perfect, just, and holy God, who boasts that he alone is the author of all the evil in the world:

I form the light and create darkness; I make peace and create evil; I the Lord do all these things (Isa. xlv, 7).

The Bible tells of a God of wisdom, who in his own holy word writes himself down a fool:

Anger resteth in the bosom of fools (Eccl. vii, 9).

The Lord said unto Moses, Take all the heads of the people and hang them up before the Lord against the sun, that the fierce anger of the Lord may be turned away from Israel (Num. xxv, 4).

Therefore will I also deal in fury; mine eye shall not spare, neither will I have pity, and though they cry in mine ears with a loud voice, yet will I not hear them (Ezek. viii, 18).

Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold mine anger and my fury shall be poured out upon this place, upon man and upon beast, and upon the trees of the field, and upon the fruit of the ground, and it shall burn and shall not be quenched (Jer. vii, 10).

Yet Boonton Christians, under New Jersey law, arrest honest men for blasphemy, and then read this abominable, blasphemous book called "holy Bible" to their children in family and Sunday-school.

This Bible describes God as so loving that he drowned the whole world in his mad fury, because it was so much worse than he (knowing all things?) ever supposed it could be. An all-wise, unchangeable God, who got out of patience with a world which was just what his own stupid blundering had made it, and knew no better way out of the muddle than to destroy it by drowning! "And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart" (Gen. vi, 6). Think of an all-wise, almighty God repenting and being grieved at his heart because his best efforts at world-making were such a wretched failure! What can equal Bible blasphemy?

Christians claim that civilization, the arts, and the sciences are all due to the Bible. But if the Bible is true, this claim is false, for Moses himself gained his wisdom from the Egyptians: "And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in words and deeds" (Acts vii, 22). The highest principle of morality did not need a Bible to reveal it. The pagans first taught the Golden Rule. Pittacus, Confucius, Thales, Sextus, Aristippus, and Socrates proclaimed, "Do to others as you would they should do to you," hundreds of years before Christ. Hillel, the great Jewish rabbi, fifty years before Christ taught, "Do not to others what you would not like others to do to you." All the ideas given of the creation and fall of man are of pagan origin. The Egyptian god, Neff, the creator, formed man's body of clay on a potter's wheel. The Babylonians had the legend of the creation and fall of man fifteen hundred years before the Hebrews heard of it. Civilization, the arts and sciences, flourished in Egypt, Greece, and Rome centuries before there was any Bible or Christianity in existence.

Hypatia, the daughter of Theon, the mathematician, taught philosophy and science. Her lecture-room was crowded with the wealth and fashion of Alexandria. Cyril was bishop of the church; he realized science would destroy priestcraft; her lectures must be stopped or the church pretense exposed. Cyril and his mob of ignorant, brutal monks stripped the fair Hypatia naked in the street, dragged her into the church, and Peter the Reader killed her with a club. Her corpse was cut to pieces, her flesh scraped from the bones with shells and cast into the fire. Boonton fanatics are not without a precedent for their lawless work. Cyril, and his Christian followers at Boonton, claim the end justified the means. They must prevent, at any cost, the exposure of the false claims of Christianity.

When Constantine indorsed Christianity the church gained absolute control. Church and state became one. Christianity, instead of being the friend of progress, art, and science, took every means to suppress enlightenment. The dungeon, the rack, the stake, the gibbet, crushed out science. During the first ten centuries of unlimited power of the Christian church, the world groped in darkness. The revival of learning in the sixteenth century was simultaneous with the decadence of priestly rule. In every period of the world's history a few brave souls have dared to speak out their honest convictions, and for the destruction of such the church has always used all the power it possessed. Fire, torture, and the sword have been used to murder millions of innocent people whose only crime was that of expressing their honest convictions.

ORIGIN OF THE BIBLE.

The Semitic race known as the Jews were the sons of the desert, the same as the Bedouins of to-day. They possessed themselves of the land of Canaan, and in subsequent generations, in writing up their early history, the fables of their being God's chosen people, and of their residence in and deliverance from Egypt, were fabricated. It was quite common in those days for nations to claim descent from the gods, or that they were the chosen favorites of the gods.

The Bible is simply a barbarous history of a barbarous people, and was confined to the Jewish church for over four thousand years. There is no historical evidence to show that the persons to whom the books of the Bible are ascribed had anything to do with writing them, or ever knew of their existence.

Before the Babylonish captivity Israel had no sacred writings. There were certain laws, prophetic writings, and a few historical books, but no one ever thought of calling them authoritative, or ascribing divine inspiration to them. Ezra brought the priestly law with him from Babylon, altering it and amalgamating it with the naratives and laws already in existence, and thus (442 B.C.) produced the Pentateuch in pretty much the same form as we now have it in.

The book of 2 Esdras (regarded as holy and inspired as much as any other scripture by the Roman Catholic church, and bound up as apocryphal in the Protestant Bible) gives the prayer of the prophet Ezra:

For thy law is burnt, therefore no man knoweth the things that are done of thee, or the works that shall begin. But if I have found grace before thee send the Holy Ghost into me and I shall write all that hath been done in the world since the beginning (2 Esdras xiv, 21, 22).

It is now admitted by most Christian writers of eminence that the compilation made by Ezra is the authority upon which we have to depend for our translations.

The Christian father Ireneus distinctly declared that "the books of the Old Testament were not in existence until they were fabricated seventy years after the Babylonish captivity by Esdras." Dean Prideaux, one of the most learned of church historians, admits Moses did not write the Pentateuch. Adam Clark declares "all antiquity is nearly unanimous in giving Ezra the honor of collecting the different writings of Moses and the prophets, and reducing them into the form in which they are now found." Dean Stanley says: "It is clear to the diligent student of the Bible that the first and second chapters of Genesis contain two narratives of the creation, side by side, differing from each other in almost every particular of time, place, and order." Bishop Colenso, in his great work, "The Pentateuch Examined," vol. ii, pp. 171–3, calls attention to the most noticeable contradictions in the two cosmogonies.

Let us examine the Bible itself. Gen. i, 1: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth."

Now, whether this beginning was six thousand years ago, as until recently all Christians claimed, or cycles of time—each day many thousand years—as the revised version, attempting to reconcile the irreconcilable, asserts, there was unquestionably an eternity before that beginning. How could an all-wise, all-powerful God have existed for all eternity with no place to dwell in, no thing or creature in existence—if existence it could be called—save himself, without sense or motion, in utter darkness? How could he suddenly wake up, after an eternity of torpidity, make light, divide it from darkness, and have morning and evening on a stationary earth without a sun? How could he keep the earth in the immensity of space in defiance of the law of gravitation?

In the first chapter of Genesis it is declared birds, beasts, and creeping things were all created before man (Gen. i, 20, 24).

In the second account, given in Gen. ii, 19, man was first created alone; then all other animals were created and brought to Adam to name.

Gen. i, 12, declares the fowls came forth from the waters. Gen. ii, 19, declares the fowls came forth from the ground. Gen. i, 27, declares man and woman were created together. Gen. ii, 10, declares that man, birds, beasts, and creeping things were all created before woman. Woman was an afterthought. God at first thought Adam could propagate alone; but after he made all other animals in pairs—male and female—he discovered his mistake, but seems to have had nothing left to make woman of, so he put Adam to sleep, stole out one of his ribs, and made a woman of it (Gen. ii, 21, 22). And if you don't believe this silly story you are an Infidel, and under Jersey law must be sent to prison for a year and fined two hundred dollars.

DID MOSES WRITE THE PENTATEUCH?

"And these are the kings that reigned in the land of Edom before there reigned any king over the children of Israel" (Gen. xxxvi, 31). Moses died 1451 B.C. Saul, the first king over Israel, was anointed 1095 B.C., 356 years after Moses died. Did Moses write Genesis 356 years after his death? "Now, the man Moses was very meek, above all the men which were upon the face of the earth" (Num. xii, 3). Did the meek Moses write that of himself? Read Exodus xxxii, 9, 14. The almighty God gets into a violent passion, and makes a lot of wild, foolish threats. The meek Moses rebukes, remonstrates with, and admonishes God, until the almighty feels ashamed of himself: "And the Lord repented of the evil which he thought to do unto his people." Read Deut. xxxii, 21, 27. The Bible God says his people made him jealous, provoked him to anger, and now he will raise the mischief with them; for he declares his anger burns like hell. He will destroy them all "were it not that I feared the wrath of the enemy."

The almighty God afraid of his enemies! Can the human mind conceive of more horrid blasphemy? Can even a New Jersey Christian believe such stuff was ever inspired by a God?

WHAT THE BIBLE REALLY TEACHES.

The Old Testament records for our instruction in morals the most foul and bestial instances of fornication, incest, and polygamy, perpetrated by God's own pet saints, and the New Testament indorses these lecherous old wretches as examples for all good Christians to follow.

Read the eleventh chapter of Hebrews—how the drunkard Noah, despite the warning of the flood, in drunken rage over his own beastliness cursed his innocent child, doomed him and all his race to slavery (Gen. ix, 21, 22). And God's holy Bible declares this drunken old brute was a just man, of whom the world was not worthy (Heb. ii, 38).

Abraham, the father of the faithful, was God's own dear A No. 1 pet saint. He teaches his wife to lie, and call herself his sister. He thus succeeds in getting his own wife taken to King Pharaoh's harem, and accepts oxen, asses, and slaves in payment for the king's use of her, for she was a beautiful woman (Gen. xii, 13, 16). Next we read that this holy man of God, the father of the faithful, debauches Hagar, his hired girl, and when the poor creature is about to become a mother, and most needs his protection, care, and sympathy, the old brute tells his wife to be just as rough with her as she pleases (Gen. xvi, 4, 6).

The poor, abused girl, Hagar, runs away from a life of sin, shame, misery, and ill-usage, and the Bible God sends his angel to compel the poor girl to go back to her cruel mistress—back to the bestial embrace of the lascivious old saint Abraham (Gen. xvii, 7, 10). And the Bible God indorses and applauds these acts (Gen. xviii, 18, 19).

When did the Bible God ever show respect for woman, heed her suffering, or regard her as other than a creature made for the gratification of the lust of his dear saints? God, reviewing the whole life of Abraham, is so well pleased with it that he blesses Isaac, "because that Abraham obeyed my voice and kept my commandments, my statutes, and my laws" (Gen. xxvi, 5). It was no violation of God's law for Abraham to make a prostitute of his own wife—a second time sell the use of her to a heathen king (Gen. xx, 2). And the heathen king rebuked the saint of God for his infamous immorality (Gen. xx, 9). Yet we are told we should all descend to heathenism but for the teachings of the holy Bible.

Lot is a superior specimen of the Bible God's best saints. He reaches the very highest standard of God's idea of a good father. The Holy Ghost God declares that he was a just and righteous man (2 Peter ii, 7).

Lot offers his two young virgin daughters to be debauched by a wild, drunken mob; unsolicited he offers them: "Behold now I have two daughters which have not known man; let me, I pray you, bring them out unto you, and do ye to them as is good in your eyes" (Gen. xix, 8).

On escaping the burning of Sodom, he dwells in a cave, with his two daughters, gets beastly drunk, and is guilty of incest with them both, the Bible God having kindly killed his wife on the flight from Sodom, for no other apparent reason than to make opportunity for his dear saint to revel in this incestuous intercourse; and, as evidence of approval and admiration of this bestiality, God performs a double miracle, and makes this drunken, incestuous orgy result in progeny and the foundation of two great nations: "Thus were both the daughters of Lot with child by their father" (Gen. xx, 36). And the New Testament declares this detestable wretch was a "just man," "a righteous soul" (2 Peter ii, 7). C. B. REYNOLDS.

(CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.)

Sat Upon by Mr. Truesdell.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Since THE TRUTH SEEKER ceased to advocate the repeal of certain laws against using the United States mails for the circulation of obscene literature, until quite recently, I hav seen so little in its editorial columns to disapprove that I had almost adopted your paper as a Liberal creed, but your recent articles upon the Chicago Anarchists arouse me to the fact that upon some questions we are as wide apart in opinion as it is possible to imagin.

I am never surprised at the sentiments expressed by some of your correspondents, for which, of course, THE TRUTH SEEKER is not responsible. The world is full of strange, unbalanced people, many of whom, although unable to govern or even support themselvs, forcibly imagin that they hav the moral, political, and financial ability to govern the world.

It was to be expected that the average crank who scoffs at all moral and civil law, or the dishonest fanatic who publicly declares that "Spiritualism false is better to advocate than Materialism true," would defend Anarchy and oppose justice, but it was not to be expected that Liberalism would be misrepresented, even unwittingly, by one of its leading organs.

When editors of Christian papers and a few clergymen some years ago denounced Liberals as obscenists, because one fanatic calling himself a Liberal had written a silly book, and others had unwisely sold it, these pious people lied. They knew that the Liberals, as a class, were not obscenists; that only a very weak minority, if any true Liberals, were in favor of circulating dirty literature. They knew then, and they now know, that our mothers and our sisters, our wives and our children, are as pure and as sacred to us, and as moral in the eyes of the world, as any other class of people that can be named. They knew, too (which they hav many times been compelled, with regrets, to acknowledge), that there are quite as much obscenity, knavery, and debauchery covered up by creeds and false pretenses as there are to be found in the ranks of Liberalism.

While we were smarting under the lash of these lying hypocrits, unfortunately one of our leading organs gave color of truth to their charges by forcing upon the Liberal convention at Syracuse a resolution advocating the repeal of the laws referred to.

I believed at that time, and I am still firm in the opinion, that the passing of that resolution was the severest blow that Liberalism has ever encountered.

While I worked and voted against the resolution, I hav charity enough to believe that among my opponents there was hardly one person in that convention who really desired to use the United States mails for immoral purposes. These misguided people were like yourself, Mr. Editor, fighting, Quixote-like, for the right of others to do something which they themselvs abhor.

You say, August 28th, after referring to them as the "so-called Anarchists of Chicago:"

> It has been a trial reflecting no credit upon either the police or state's attorneys of Chicago, and the verdict is the result of popular prejudice against the Anarchists. It is a monstrous verdict, and, unless reversed by the Supreme Court of Illinois, will end in judicial murder. Aside from the injustice done the men themselvs, this trial is deplorable in its results. The verdict angers the thousands of Socialists in Chicago, while feeding the wrath of the general public against them. . . . The trial has outraged every distinctivly American principle, and this conviction, if sustained, and the men executed, will be as black a blot upon the fame of the republic as are the years of negro slavery. . . . We hav no sympathy with the wild gasconade and threats of those Anarchistic orators. They are the blind leading the blind; but we hav an abiding faith in freedom, a warm regard for fair play, and a jealous love for American institutions.

This is precisely the position taken by some Northern newspapers of doubtful loyalty during our late civil war. These papers denied all sympathy with rebellion in as strong terms as THE TRUTH SEEKER expresses its disapproval of Anarchy in; they even went so far as to declare in almost every issue their loyalty to the Union. Yet these very editors bitterly opposed every movement made by the government in defense of its existence. Every copperhead editor in the land had a way of his own to bring the war to a close, and that way was, in substance, to slyly encourage the rebels, and at the same time to denounce every action of "Lincoln's hirelings"—the Union army and the government. It was, they claimed, illegal to raise an army to defend the Union, and unconstitutional to issue paper money.

When Vallandigham was sent "beyond the lines" for discouraging enlistments and other treasonable conduct, indignation meetings were held and the government was bitterly denounced by pretended loyal men, in just about the same language as that in which the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER now denounces the judge and jury at Chicago, and declares "there is no such thing as a treasonable utterance in this country!"

When Mrs. Surratt was hanged as an accomplice in the brutal murder of our lamented President Lincoln, these same editors held up their hands in holy horror, saying, with THE TRUTH SEEKER, "It is judicial murder! It will unite the South" (Anarchists of Chicago). While they could not, with any pretense of fairness, advocate the discharge from all responsibility of the man who fired the fatal shot (threw the bomb) they stoutly maintained, in substance, that he was the only man who could be legally punished.

In a later issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, September 25th, I note with pleasure your strong denunciation of Anarchy; yet I sincerely regret to see, in the same article, you giv vent to the following strange language:

> Freethought, as we understand it, stands for absolute freedom of thought, of speech, of publication, upon any and every subject on earth. There is no such thing as a treasonable utterance in this country.

It is fortunate for Liberalism that you qualified your remarkable definition of Freethought by the words, "as we understand it," for I do not believe that one Liberal in a hundred can be found who understands it as you do. If you had used the word "Anarchy" instead of "Freethought," your definition would be more fitting.

THE TRUTH SEEKER'S denunciation of Anarchy and its tacit defense of the rights of Anarchists is about like denouncing murder and defending the right of a man to be a murderer. You say, September 25th: "The question is not whether these men are Anarchists, or Socialists, or Infidels, or Christians, but, Are they guilty of premeditated murder?"

This is strange reasoning. There is no more analogy between an Anarchist and an Infidel than there is between an outlaw and a Methodist. One may be a peaceful, law-abiding citizen, while the other is a self-acknowledged criminal, advocating the breaking of nearly all law.

Again, you say in substance that Parsons and his co-conspirators were tried for murder and convicted of Anarchy. Well, so much the worse for these human fiends. Suppose they had been accused of petty larceny and found guilty of grand larceny, should we blame the judge and the jury because these wretches were worse than they had supposed them to be? There are crimes on the calendar far worse than murder, and the devilish conspiracy which was clearly proven before a competent judge and a just jury of twelve men against the Chicago Anarchists was as much worse than simple murder as robbing a savings bank exceeds petty larceny.

Liberalism has enough legitimate work to perform without seemingly to uphold the wild whims of every crank who makes war upon society. We should build as well as tear down, and in raising our new structure it behooves every Liberal, be he editor or layman, to be constantly on his guard against tacitly advocating or apologizing for crime.

The Christian church is fast sinking under the waves of popular opinion, simply because she is too heavily loaded with superstition and hypocrisy. Let all Liberals take warning, lest we, too, unwittingly overload our ship or allow our opponents to sink her with the deadly freight of Anarchy and obscenity.

Syracuse, Sept 27, 1886. JOHN W. TRUESDELL.

Picked Up By Mr. Renwick.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am an old man, a patron of THE TRUTH SEEKER, was an earnest friend of D. M. Bennett, and believe to-day, as then, that he was falsely charged, tried, convicted, and punished. You said so then, and say so now, and it seems to hav given offense to some so-called truth seekers, notably, John Ray, of Ontario. And, beginning with his postscript, which, if it means anything, means that a man with a backbone in him is a forlorn hope in the editorial chair of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I beg leave to differ from him.

John Ray plainly tells us that his mind completely flopped over between the dates August 13th and 28th. Then he did not think you were outside of your latitude; now he does. He tells us you "appear to advocate the views of the Anarchists." If this is true, he should be able to point out at least the number of the paper that contains it. "Deprecate" would hav been the exact word—not "advocate" Mr. Ray tells us "there is war between labor and capital, and he does not think the affairs of the nation would be improved by conceding to the demands of the Anarchists or working classes." I am a wage earner, John Ray. I am not an Anarchist. Are you? I believe in law and order. Do you?

I believe in a fair day's work for a fair day's pay. Do you? This is the demand of the honest workingman, only this and nothing more. With the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I do not believe in the vicarious hanging of half a dozen men because they could not catch the wretch who threw the shell. Do you? Tabernacle Talmage recommended that an Irish Roman Catholic policeman should bespatter the walls of a theater with the brains of Colonel Ingersoll, but I would not hang him for it. Would you? For your "intelligence and capital," I would suggest "avarice and capital" as the proper words to use.

And now, in conclusion, permit me to say that I hav seen some service, and would enlist again to defend the right of John Ray to express his views upon any subject, before any audience that wished to hear him. With the most supreme contempt for judge and jury in the trials at Chicago, and a hearty bravo for your backbone in denouncing them, I remain sound for free speech, a free press, and a free people.

Louisville, Ky. WM. E. RENWICK.

W. E. Gould, Portland's Defaulter.

From the Lewiston, Maine, Labor Advocate.

A bosom friend of W. E. Gould, the Portland defaulter, has this to say of him:

"Let them say what they may, I say to you that William Edward Gould has felt a strong desire to see sinners coming to Christ. This busy business man, whatever may hav been his faults, has felt that there was for him a special work if he preached not the gospel. I know that recently he expressed the greatest concern in regard to the possible spread of the errors of Colonel Ingersoll. He has been honest in all of his religious experiences."

We can't help thinking that the stockholders of the First National Bank, of Portland, would much rather hav the errors of Ingersoll spread around their counters than the errors of Gould A man who is so terribly good that he will steal to prevent the spread of Bob Ingersollism is too goody-good for a bank cashier. The best thing that they can do with Gould is to send him as a missionary to the Cannibal Islands, so that when he finds a cannibal that is inclined to eat somebody, Gould can eat the cannibal and thus stop the spread of cannibalism.

We don't pity the bank any. When one thief steals from another the people lose nothing. This seventy thousand the bank has lost was taken from the people and no equivalent given; and Gould knew it and he, undoubtedly, thought he might as well take it as the bank. But we do feel real sorry that Gould has been deprived of carrying out the great aim of his life—stopping the spread of Ingersollism and the substitution of Gouldism in its place.

An Open Letter to Henry George.

HENRY GEORGE, ESQ., MAYORALTY CANDIDATE OF THE LABOR REFORM PARTY, Dear Sir: As you are a Reform candidate for the mayoralty of this city, the Freethinkers of the town take a peculiar interest in your campaign. A large proportion of them are activ advocates of labor reform and of your candidacy for mayor. As in many respects the most brilliant advocate of land reform this century has seen, as an avowed Free Trader, and as a sympathizer with labor, your reputation is as wide as the diffusion of the English language. There is, however, one form of injustice to which labor is subject. upon which no expression of opinion has been published by you. We mean those forms of ecclesiastical robbery which the Nine Demands of Liberalism oppose. A statement of these Demands being also a statement of the laws which Liberals desire repealed, we quote them here for your perusal:

"1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from just taxation.

"2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in state legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

"3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

"4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

"5. We demand that the appointment, by the president of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

"6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

"7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

"8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of 'Christian' morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

"9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made."

The first of these demands is, in land and property interest involved, the most important. Doubtless you are aware that in the United States there are over 100.000 church buildings, aggregating in value some $746,294,833. This vast property enjoys the protection of the state. If threatened by fire, the state protects it; if destroyed by mobs, the state remunerates the churches. Yet, for this protection the religious organizations pay not one cent to the public treasury. The Freethinkers demand that this $746,294,833 worth of ecclesiastical property bear its just share of the burden of taxation. What is your opinion of this demand?

The second demand of Liberalism relates to chaplains in the various national and state institutions. I would call your attention to the amendment to the Constitution which prohibits Congress from establishing religion, and then to the following facts: The Army Register shows 30 white and 4 colored chaplains in service. In the navy there are 23 activ chaplains and 6 retired. Congress employs two. Reckoning their different grades of pay, we find that the United States annually devotes to establishing religion the following amounts: Chaplains in Congress, $1,800; in the army, $84,600; in the navy, $60,000. Total, $146,400. The Freethinkers demand that this unconstitutional expenditure shall cease. Do you, esteemed sir, agree with them?

The third demand relates to public appropriations for schools and other institutions of a sectarian character. Let me call your attention to a few facts which may possibly hav escaped your notice. In the city to the mayoralty of which your friends (and you hav no better friends than among the Freethinkers) desire to elevate you, one church, the Catholic, has been given in real estate $3,500,000; in cash, $6,043,626.45; and is now receiving about $700,000 annually. The reason for these donations is the alleged moral influence of the church. But Freethinkers cannot admit that Catholicism is a good policeman when we find that in 66 prisons of the United States and Canada more than one-third of the inmates are Roman Catholics. Many of the institutions which receive public support are but Catholic parochial schools under aliases, in which children are educated in the tenets of Romanism. Respecting the influence which these schools exert, I would call your attention to the following from Dexter A. Hawkins: "The parochial school," he says, "in comparison with the public school, has relativly reduced and dwarfed the ability of the brilliant Irish race to gain a livelihood to such an extent that in the city of New York, from 1871 to 1875 inclusiv, five years, the Department of Charities and Corrections cared for Irish paupers to the number of 98,787; while of Americans there were only 63,178; of Germans, only 24,273; and of all other races only 17,563. In addition to this there were each year several thousand of the Irish race assisted by the charitable institutions of their church, of which we hav no reliable data.

"The above figures, reduced to a comparativ ratio based on the last United States census of each race in this city, taking the Americans as the unit of the ratio, givs the following:

"Americans	1.00
Irish	3.50
German	1.33
All others	1.50

"In other words, a child trained up in the Roman Catholic parochial school is so much inferior intellectually to one trained up in the public school, that he is three and a half times as likely to become a pauper as he would be if he attended the free public schools of the city."

The Freethinkers, therefore, demand that sectarian appropriations shall cease forever. Do you, Mr. George, incline to this opinion?

The fourth demand asks that governmental religious services and the use of the Bible in the schools shall be done away with. The injustice of the present customs in these matters must be apparent at once to a man of your discriminating powers. The support of the state is compulsory, and every citizen contributes his share toward its expenses. What right, therefore, hav our legislators to use a portion of the people's money to pay for prayers which a large number of taxpayers regard as so much superstitious mummery and a relic of barbaric sacrifices to idols? A Jew is forced in this way to sustain a religion which he knows is false; a Mohammedan pays for what is to him an infidel service; a Freethinker contributes to a most debasing exhibition of fear and flattery, which his soul abhors. Is it fair to force this contribution by law? As to the presence of a religious book in our public schools, you cannot be unaware of the trouble it is at present causing in this country. The Catholics are building parochial schools and withdrawing their children from the public institutions, in many cases crippling the work of secular education. But we cannot blame the Romish church. It is unfair for officious religious teachers to cram their denominational doctrins down the throats of children of all denominations and of no denomination. In some places (West Point, Wis., for one) children whose parents object to hav theology taught them hav been forced to wait in cold entry-ways while the Methodist teacher puts the scholars through a course of Bible reading and Methodist song and lay sermon. Was this right? If our schools are free, should they teach religion of any kind? Freethinkers hav a curiosity to know how so distinguished a man as yourself views the fourth demand of Liberalism.

The fifth demand is for the abolition of governmental fast days. When Thomas Jefferson was asked to appoint fast days and "Thanksgivings" he refused, saying he had no right to do it; and during the eight years of his administration he adhered to this Constitutional construction of his duty. He is to-day regarded as our model president—as knowing most about the intentions of the founders of this government—as being the most American American that ever sat in the presidential chair. And surely a man who played so important a part in establishing the American republic may be regarded as its best exponent. You hav publicly declared your belief in the principles of Thomas Jefferson. Will you, Mr. George, if elected to the mayoralty of this city, do what you may to follow the example of Jefferson?

As to judicial "oaths," for the abolition of which, in our courts of justice, the sixth demand of Liberalism was framed. Oaths are relics of the times when men proved the truth of their words by offering their bodies in mortal combat. It needs no argument to show the absurdity of such a proceeding. Oaths upon a religious book, aside from their farcical aspect, place the liar at an advantage over the honest man. No honest man will conceal, if he hav it, his contempt for a book filled with obscenity, but the liar will glibly take the oath, kiss the book, go upon the witness-stand, and perjure himself. The honest man is ruled out of court; the liar's testimony is taken. Would you vote for the retention on our statute books of the absurd laws that permit this?

Sunday laws, for the repeal of which the seventh of Liberalism's demands asks, are the expression of a theological opinion. They are maintained for the benefit of the priests and ministers, who, not possessing the confidence of the people, are afraid if Sunday laws are repealed they will be out of a job. In the words of Parker Pillsbury: "Break this one yoke and priestly domination is no more. With this holy day must go their holy office, and with it their holy and reverend selvs." Sunday is made gloomy by these laws; and every man who takes a little recreation on that day is made a criminal and a law-breaker. He is forbidden by these laws to enjoy himself; to take his family into the fields, or to indulge with them in healthful out-door amusement. The practical effect of Sunday laws in most places is to close everything but the churches and rum-shops. This is not a healthy result, as the Monday morning books of the police courts show. In this city, especially, do the Sunday laws work disastrously. Every museum is closed; every public library but one is closed; every reading-room but one is closed. A visitor to the park can see nothing but the ground and the outside of the museum buildings upon which the city has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars. The present mayor—a Roman Catholic, by the way—made an effort last fall to hav these museums opened on Sundays. Will you, if elected, labor to effect that opening? And will you further use such power as a mayor rightfully can to make of Sunday a free day, upon which the laborer can find that recreation from which his occupation absolutely bars him on week-days?

Morality, which is the subject of the eighth demand, does not depend upon any religious system for its support. Mohammedans are moral in some respects, in others immoral. Buddhists are moral and immoral. Jews the same. "Thou shalt not steal" is an expression of natural morality, and does not depend upon Buddha's reiteration of it for its authoritativness. True morality is the result of the experience of the human race, and is that which benefits them. An action is moral or immoral according as it helps or hurts the doer and those affected by it. Sunday laws, blasphemy laws, oath laws, laws appointing fasts, laws enforcing religious services, laws recognizing any particular religious book, laws allowing churches special privileges, are the result of an attempted grafting of Christianity upon the state, an attempt also to enforce a morality specially denominated Christian. It is not against natural morality to enjoy one's self on Sunday; and natural morality was never promoted by a blasphemy statute. It is only "Christian" morality which commands one to lengthen his face on Sunday, or that finds blasphemy in the expression of an honest opinion of the Bible. Christian morality, in August of 1886, in New Jersey, indicted as a criminal a man for saying that he did not believe the first chapter of Genesis is true. Freethinkers, therefore, demand the repeal of such laws, and the basing of legal enactment upon the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

The ninth demand ought to meet your ready acceptance. At the present day, in about two-thirds of our states Atheists are disqualified from appearing in court. They may not testify; nor can they sit as jurors. In Massachusetts the law discredits them —they are not supposed to be honest. In New Hampshire no Catholic can hold a state office. Almost everywhere the courts are prejudiced against so-called heresy, and in favor of religion. A Christian known to be a man of doubtful veracity can in all the states be accepted as a good witness. A heretic, though known to be honest, virtuous, wise, is rejected by laws based on Christian morality. This monstrous injustice the Freethinkers are laboring to redress. If you are elected to office, will they obtain your aid?

In the last presidential campaign letters similar to this were addressed to the candidates aspiring to enter the White House. The managers of their campaigns made no reply, nor was it expected they would. They knew too much to commit themselvs upon these subjects. They knew that hypocrisy in a politician is his stock in trade; that no man who honestly expressed favorable sentiments on these matters could be elected; that if the candidate did not cater to Christianity, or "work the religious racket," as it is called by the practical politicians, he might as well commit suicide. But you are running, not as a politician, but as a Reformer, with a capital R. Your published principles are radical—as far from the orthodox social economy as Infidelity is from the orthodox theology—heretical in conception, destructiv in tendency, and revolutionary in their applied outcome. Every orthodox owner of an acre of ground is your natural enemy; every stockholder in a corporation should wish you hanged; and every monopoly would probably cheerfully contribute to the expense of a rope. Your friends are the wronged and oppressed; the weak and almost friendless; the poor, the blind, the halt, and the lame. Like Jesus, you hav for disciples the common people, and not the rich and powerful. Such opinions as you profess hav been given with the boldness and rugged vigor that indicate the sincere man. We are in hopes, therefore, that your moral and political backbone will bear the strain of announcing your views upon those demands which organized Liberalism makes in behalf of justice to the poor, the equality of sects, and impartial liberty for all.

It was the thought of the founders of this republic, as you doubtless know, to make this a secular republic. We do not mean by this that all our Revolutionary forefathers were Secularists, in the sense that a Secularist is an Infidel, but we do mean that the uppermost thought with them was to secure perfect religious freedom for all religions and for no religion. Our forefathers had practical experience with the discriminations which theologians make when they get the chance to govern. The men who established our republic had seen witches hanged on Boston Common; they had seen women stripped and lashed through streets of Massachusetts towns because of their alleged heresy; they had seen Quakers driven into a frozen wilderness to perish; they had seen the bitter fights between the Puritans and the churchmen of England; they had seen Protestants making war upon Catholics; they had read the blasphemy statutes, which sent heretics to the stocks and gallows, to the whipping-post and pillory; they had read the Maryland statute which for three times denying the holy trinity condemned the offender to death, and they had seen with horror the scar of the branding-iron upon Infidel foreheads. Do you wonder, then, that our forefathers placed in our Constitution an eternal prohibition against religion forming any part of our law? And with that prohibition they went down to the grave feeling that they had secured perfect religious liberty for their country for all time. What a glorious monument to their manhood is that prohibition, and in what appalling degeneracy do we see the laws and practices of our states to-day! Confiding in their Constitutional guarantees, the people hav rested in the belief that, religiously, this country is free. They awake to-day to find themselvs in legal chains to the churches. Before the suffrages of your friends can be cast for you, Mr. George, a man will be tried, not thirty miles from this city, for blasphemy—for saying that he did not believe the first chapter of Genesis. That man has a wife and children, and it may be their lot to see the husband and father taken from them and put in a cell in a state prison, a criminal and companion of criminals! What think you of laws that make this possible? Is not the repeal of such infamous enactments as important, as humanitarian, as holy a work as the saving of a few dollars a year to the taxpayers of New York?

But this letter grows long. It was not intended to preach you a sermon upon Christian injustice, for to be hated that needs but to be seen. It was only desired to get your opinion—favorable or unfavorable—upon some subjects which, as Freethinkers, we deemed the most important of any now before the people. Politicians, like St. Paul, are all things to all men, to the end that they may get votes, and their promises are usually valuable only before election. But of a Reform candidate unusual things are expected—even so unusual a thing as a declaration of the views he holds upon unpopular reforms. We shall therefore take pleasure in giving your reply the same prominence we hav given these questions.

A Social Club.

Mr. Willard Brown, a member of the Manhattan Club of this city, last week invited Edward Aveling and Mr. Liebnecht to visit him at his club. The invitation was accepted. While seated on the balcony, discussing music and art, they received a message from the governors of the club to the effect that their room was preferable to their company. The reason given to Mr. Brown as the cause of this expulsion of his guests was that Aveling and Liebnecht were "Socialists over here in the interests of those Socialists who are under sentence of death in Chicago." As such "they are enemies to the free institutions that Americans love." So Dr. Aveling and Herr Liebnecht had to go.

If this were only another illustration of the boorish manners of the members of the Manhattan Club, it would not be a very serious matter, but as showing how scared the people are at Socialism, the incident deserves permanent record. Years ago, the self-named "respectability" of Boston ejected from their houses and clubs the Abolitionists, because they wanted to see justice done the slaves. The "respectability" of Boston has since then tumbled all over itself and rolled in the mud in its eagerness to do honor to those Abolitionists.

Ostracism from so-called society is the penalty usually paid by the holders of unpopular opinions for possessing brain enough to differ from the orthodox folks. Infidels, especially, know what it is to be pointed out as curiosities. But such ostracism is a badge of honor, worn proudly by the victims, and the probabilities are that Messrs. Aveling and Liebnecht can stand their expulsion if the Manhattan Club can. They are not Anarchists, but Socialists, and hav no more sympathy with the opinions of such gentlemen as Benjamin R. Tucker and Henry Appleton than they hav for the teachings of the Communist of Judea or of his apostles. But the people who call everybody who objects to be swindled by law an Anarchist will never find this fact out, and they will go on calling Socialism Anarchy to the end of their days.

As for the Manhattan Club, considering the kind of material of which it is composed, there is nothing strange in its action. Though it is a Democratic club, there is no doubt that Thomas Jefferson would be expelled if he talked his heresy on its balcony today. So would Jesus Christ be kicked off the portals of the fashionable churches of the city. Between the supercilious uppercrust of "society" and the degraded lowercrust of ignorant serfs who vote as the priest tells them, there is but precious little left of that American spirit of independence and love of personal liberty which gave us the best system of government the world has yet seen. Opinions adverse to the rightfulness of buying and selling men and women because their skins were black, and opinions adverse to the claims of scripture, hav all along been met with the cold shoulder, and the passing by on the other side. Now it seems that opinions as to the nature of property and the structure and functions of government are to be punished in like manner. To be consistent, every member of the Manhattan Club should refuse to speak to Henry George, who audaciously proposes to revolutionize our property system by taxing land irrespectiv of improvements, so that those who are now holding land vacant shall be compelled either to build on it themselvs or to giv up the land to those who will.

Fools oft do funny things, but to the Manhattan Club must be awarded the chief jester's cap and bells.

Editorial Notes.

THE Independent gravely considers the question of whether we of this generation hav a "personal share in Adam's guilt." The editor once asked a candidate for the foreign mission work, "If you believe that you actually had a personal part in Adam's sin of eating that fruit, why don't you, the next time you kneel in prayer, tell God you repent of it, and ask him to forgiv you for it?" The answer silenced all response: "Why, I hav done it a thousand times." And the editor adds: "President Edwards approvingly relates how a young woman in his congregation was deeply convicted of the guilt of Adam's first sin and heartily repented of it." The utter puerility of such gibberish as this does not seem to be apparent to the writer, but it ought to be to the reader.

THE Petaluma Secular Free Library is the title of one of the best institutions in the city of Petaluma, Cal. It is a well-equipped library, for a young one, due to the generosity and public spirit of a few of the Infidels of the place. One gentleman donated $200, another one $50 with which to start the collection of books, and two others gave some $55 worth of Liberal volumes. For the present the library is located in the store of Philip Cowen, who gratuitously acts as librarian. The collection of works will be extended as means permit and the people show interest in the enterprise. Petaluma is fortunate in at least a few of her citizens, who, by the establishment of a free library, hav furnished occupation for the leisure hours of the people, thereby doing a great deal toward emptying the saloons. It remains only for the people to appreciate and patronize the library and so extend its sphere of usefulness.

EVERY week THE TRUTH SEEKER, illuminated by Watson Heston's inimitable cartoons upon the absurdities of the Bible, finds its way to our table of valued exchanges, bringing up reminiscences of the grand old truth seeker who started upon the waters of superstition the bark which has since grown to be a well-recognized power in the cause of progress. If, as he always hoped, the change termed death did not end his conscious existence, the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER must look with gratification and pleasure upon the conduct and growth of his journal. Impartial and just, its columns are always open to every side of every question. Keen and observing, its managers see beneath the surface and send forth ample warning of hidden dangers. Like a lightship anchored out upon the trackless ocean THE TRUTH SEEKER points to all the way which leads toward eternal justice.—Missouri Liberal.

WE do not imagin that a reply in detail to Mr. John W. Truesdell's communication is needed. For a man bent on gathering bottom facts he writes very incoherently. He insinuates that we hav advocated Anarchy, when the facts are that for months we hav opposed it; he likens our position to that of the copperhead editors during the war, but he cannot support his position by the quotation of a line; he brings in the old obscenity business, insinuating that the "repeal" people are working for the transmission of filth in the mails, when he knows that our position on that question is purely one of Constitutional limitation; he tacitly asserts that treasonable talk is punishable, when if he ever read the Constitution he knows that treasonable acts only can be punished by the government; he denies that Freethought means free thought on all subjects; he more than insinuates that an Anarchist is worse than a murderer; and winds up by asserting that a "devilish conspiracy" was clearly proved against the Chicago people now under sentence of death, but does not attempt to support the assertion by a word of evidence. He seems to view the Anarchists precisely as Talmage does the Infidels. Last Sunday Talmage asked his congregation, "Does it not seem to you as if the time had come for God to punish the defamation of his name and truth? Look abroad and see the blasphemy in this country. A blasphemer can go up and down this continent lecturing against God, in defiance of the laws of this country, and no mayor has had backbone enough to stop him, except a former mayor of Toronto. Blasphemy is worse than murder; worse than arson. These are only offenses against humanity, while blasphemy is an offense against almighty God." Mr. Truesdell's argument is one of pure sentiment; his "facts" are entirely imaginary, and his conclusions square with his prejudices. Talmage thinks that Infidels hav no rights that Christians are bound to respect. Mr. Truesdell thinks that Anarchists hav no rights that anybody is bound to respect. We are sorry that our esteemed friend has done us so gross an injustice as to misrepresent what we hav said, but we are content to leave the matter with his own conscience and the common sense of our readers.

Letters from Friends.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Sept. 28, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Charles Watts has again visited Pittsburgh, and stirred up the City of Natural Gas "unto good work." He lectured at Maltby Hall before the Pittsburgh Secular Society on Sunday, the 26th inst., on "The Reformation; or, Catholicism or Protestantism, Which?" As a historical resumé of the Reformation, and a critical comparison of the respectiv merits of Catholicism and Protestantism, it was a marvel of judicious discrimination, happy illustration, and logical application of the lessons of history to a correct solution of the problem.

Mr. Watts was in his happiest vein, and the frequent applause of the large audience attested their appreciation of his effort. At 8 P.M. he lectured at Wilson's Hall in Allegheny City, on "Saints or Sinners—Which?" This was an entirely new lecture, and was not delivered with that elan and audacious abandon so characteristic of Mr. Watts when scoring orthodoxy, yet its frequent sallies of wit and humor were sufficient to amuse while instructing his audience. He left last night for Grand Rapids, Mich., to labor in the vinyard.

Yours, HARRY HOOVER.

SPRINGVILLE, UTAH, Aug. 26, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: After reading the account of the wrong-doings that took place at Boonton, N. J., in damaging the tent, etc., in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I wrote to my friend, Wm. Reynolds, of Wanship, proposing to him that we send around to all our good folks and invite them to assist in the war against the enemies of truth. In answer he said his mite had been sent, etc., and, of course, we that want to can do the same in a separate or united manner, seeing it is no more than our duty to stand by and uphold our leading men in the front who are battling with the enemy of truth and right for our cause in the lecture-field and through the press, sometimes meeting and having to get along the best way they can with real devils led on by their masters.

I intend in the course of a month, more or less, to see and confer with my friend H. S. Brooks, of Payson, and see if we can raise a few dollars to send in to the assistance of the tent fund, which should be kept going as long as possible.

I expect my friend C. B. Reynolds will defend himself the best he can in law with those mobocrats; and should an unrighteous decision in law be made, it will only lower those who so decide in the estimation of all honest people.

As this world has its ups and downs we may expect to meet both in our travels, but let us stick and hang together to oppose the errors of this world, and cling to the truth and the right forever. People hav to be taught correct ideas and then the world will grow better. Old ideas should be got rid of and new and better ones adopted.

LUKE WM. GALLUP.

GLEN HALL, PA., Sept. 11, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I received a letter from you desiring that all subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER should pay in advance. As my subscription expires on the first, I herewith inclose $3, hoping that all subscribers will do likewise, as surely it would be a small inconvenience to each, while in the aggregate it would be a great favor to the editor.

J. Peck's articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER are very good, and I think that, put in tract or pamphlet form, they might be circulated to good advantage. I would take two or three dozen of them at a fair price for gratuitous circulation, as my lot seems to be cast in strong surroundings of priesthood, and we are rarely ever favored with Liberal lectures. Some three years past, I communicated with Mr. Bell, and he came on. I engaged the hall in West Chester, and it proved to be a very pleasant moonlight night. Only some five or six came out. I hired a bell-man to ring around the town, and yet the number was not increased. So it proved a failure. I paid for hall and bell-man, and so the matter dropped; but not without a strong desire on my part that some one who could draw an audience would offer. I went over thirty miles to Philadelphia to hear Mr. Ingersoll, and see if I could get him to come to West Chester. He promised me he would come. I hav written and sent word to him, and yet he does not come. There is not the least doubt of him getting a full house. I will engage the hall and do the advertising, if he will fix the time and drop me a postal. I do want the still water of orthodoxy stirred up. Will you help me?

R. I. SANBORN.

HOLDEN, Mo., Sept. 16, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav for a few months been a subscriber to and an interested reader of your paper. Some things in it do not accord with my views. This is to be expected in a Liberal paper where all subjects are freely discussed from all standpoints.

I am a Theist. I believe that all organic forms were evolved, and that some supreme being, entity, or energy in some way gave emanation and impress to the force of nature. But I do not believe in a personal God. It would be as absurd to conceive of a God endowed with sex as of one encumbered with a tail. I do not believe that God dictated a book, or begat a son.

Another thing to which I wish to demur is a tendency on the part of some of your correspondents to apologize for the crimes of the Anarchists. From my standpoint their principles are at enmity with civilization, and the organization known as the Knights of Labor is their progeny.

In the main, I like your paper—one grand feature of which is "Letters from Friends." Through these we can commune with intelligent thinkers in almost every part of the world.

I hav been an ardent believer in Freethought and an outspoken disbeliever in revealed religion for many years. Fifteen years ago I stood almost alone here on these subjects. Now we hav good schools, and daily, weekly, and monthly periodicals from all points of the compass, and the result is that about three hundred Liberal men and women get their mail here.

Five years ago, when my boy was only five years old, he wanted to go to Sunday-school. We permitted him to go. On one "blessed Sabbath" morning, however, he said he did not want to go to Sunday-school that day. When asked why, he said, "Oh, there is too much Jesus and Jerusalem in it." I think it the duty of parents to teach their children to avoid the slums of superstition, and the consequent shackles of orthodoxy, and the dogmas of creeds.

All men and women will be better when they know that they can't pray out of the consequences of wrong-doing; that there is no sin-cleansing virtue in the blood of a man who has been dead for many years; that truth, sobriety, and rectitude are the means and harbingers of happiness.

C. L. CARTER, M.D.

ABILENE, KAN., Sept. 14, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed ten cents for another copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER dated Sept. 11, 1886. You will observe that I am doing a little missionary work, by sending some copies of the dear old TRUTH SEEKER, which I appreciate very much indeed, to some friends of mine, although they are very much surprised to know that I am such a strong Liberal in Freethought, and take such an interest in working for the same, after being such a strict and faithful worker in the Lutheran church for the last twenty years. They say they cannot see why it is.

But I was unfortunate, when I was a little boy ten years old, in losing my right arm by the threshing-machine, and ever since I had plenty of leisure time for reading and traveling some in the world, and hearing discussions on all subjects, and I became fully convinced that the Liberals hav the best ground to stand upon, more common sense and reason to go by, whereas the church rests nearly all on faith, something we cannot go by, for the simple reason that it is unreasonable.

I will send a few copies of the Lutheran Observer. Observe the marked pieces, as they may be of interest to you.

I hav been a very close and constant reader of what they call religious papers ever since I knew anything, and, knowing so well by experience the running of churches, I am now perfectly disgusted with them. But nevertheless I take an interest in going to church occasionally and reading their church papers. In that way we get both sides of the question. That is the kind of Liberalism I believe in. I pity those fellows that can see only one side of a thing. Accept anything that has truth in it, no matter what it is.

In looking over church papers, it is astonishing the amount of money spent for superstition, and to feed a lot of worthless preachers and priests.

I hav a picture entitled, "A Short Lesson in History for Christians," nicely framed and hung in my bed-room, and also a large picture of Col. Robert G. Ingersoll decorating my room, and when my Christian friends come to see me I show them, and it grieves them so that they can hardly stand the sight. When they see the cut where the church is encouraging astronomy by murdering Bruno; "The Beginning of Freethought;" "Galileo Forced to Recant" by the priest standing beside him with the sword of the Inquisition; "Teachers of Science;" "Teachers of Salvation;" "Presbyterianism, the Telegraph, and the Steam-engin;" and "The Last Argument of the Church"—when they see all that they turn away from it mad and say, "It's a lie!" The church, they say, "never did such a thing." J. BEETEM WISE.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, Sept. 5, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Under the heading of "Powderly and Communism," in the THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 4, 1886. is an article by some one styling himself "Justice." For ignorance and misrepresentation of the Knights of Labor and Mr. Powderly, it beats anything I hav seen for some time.

To begin with, he says: "I desire to ask if the actions of the Knights of Labor in Chicago. Milwaukee, Detroit, and New York, and the Gould Southwestern system, where they resorted to intimidation, violence, forcible possession, yea, and to murder, were justifiable." He also says that Mr. Powderly boasted that unless Mr. Gould came to his terms he would order a universal boycott on Mr. Gould. The above statements, taken as a whole, are false and a misrepresentation. In the first place, in the Chicago riots the Knights of Labor took no part, but instead they offered their services to the mayor to put down the riot, and since then they hav been expelling all Anarchists and Socialists from their assembly. In Milwaukee there was no riot, but the men while going in a body to request the men to quit work were fired upon by the Pinkerton detectivs, killing several, which created great excitement among the strikers, who would hav instituted a riot but for the interposition of Mr. Robert Schilling, who was called on by the mayor to quiet the men and keep them from raising a disturbance, and had succeeded in doing so when the governor ordered the militia to the city and gave orders for them to shoot to kill, and the militia, appearing there when all was quiet, so excited the men again that they became uncontrollable, and all the persuasion and entreaties of Mr. Schilling could not stay them. I ask, Who was to blame for what followed? I leave that to all candid thinkers. The strikers were not armed, and intended no violence. So much for Milwaukee.

The strike on the Gould Southwestern system was inaugurated entirely against positiv orders from Mr. Powderly by that hot-headed traitor, Martin Irons, who has since been compelled to fly from the wrath of the Knights of Labor, who hav discovered his rascality, and from evidence which has convinced them that he was hired by capitalists to ruin the order.

The New York strikes were not ordered by the Knights of Labor, and not carried on as Knights of Labor strikes.

"Justice" says: "Yet he [Powderly] givs the Southwest strike his official countenance and the support of the whole order." Why should he not do so? Although he declares the strike unjustifiable and uncalled for, those men were led to and deceived into doing as they did by that traitor Martin Irons. Is that any reason why those men should not be kept from starvation by the support of the whole order? And as for Powderly being a vain boaster, that is false from beginning to end. Mr. Powderly is not a man given to boasting. You cannot put your finger on a single boast that he is said to hav made that cannot be traced to be a sensational newspaper article, got up for the sole purpose of creating enmity to the Knights of Labor. Mr. Powderly says but very little, but when he does speak there is no mistaking what he says and means.

Also the L. S. & M S. strike was not a Knights of Labor strike, nor was it ordered by Powderly. Wherever there has been a strike by the Knights of Labor it has been brought about by the trade unionist and political tricksters that hav gained access to the order, and especially in newly organized assemblies where they, being better versed in governing societies, soon become leaders and trample under foot the principles under which they are organized. I challenge any man to refute the statement that the principles under which the Knights of Labor are organized, if carried into effect, would bring peace and prosperity to the whole world. There would be no paupers, no poor, no money oligarchies, no grinding monopolies, no legalized robbers (the national banks and bond-holders). No such things as these would disgrace our fair land.

CHAS. L. WATSON.

GREELEY, COL., Sept. 24, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: "The Story Hour" came safely to hand, and I am very much pleased with it. There are a great many things contained therein that might prove instructiv to older persons. It is just the kind of literature to place in the hands of small children, being entirely free from superstition.

Two weeks ago a Seventh-day Adventist pitched his tent in our midst, and began a series of lectures. I went to hear him enough to satisfy myself that the Adventists who believe as he does are logically deficient. I am more thoroughly disgusted with the Bible than ever. I do wish Mr. Reynolds would come here and giv the community something worth hearing. There are a great many Liberals here who are highly capable of comprehending facts. I think the late earthquake in the South has done a little good. It has shaken a little reason into one minister's head. I copy the following extract from a letter on the subject, given by Rev. Dr. Wilson, who stands high in the Episcopal church of Charleston, S. C. Dr. Wilson is one of the most learned gentlemen of that city, and has given the subject of earthquakes and the subterranean formations about Charleston special study, and he speaks as sensibly upon the subject as he dares. He says: "The man who calls this a visitation of God's wrath for sins is a fanatic who ought to be silenced. God is a loving father, and not an executioner. Such talk is narrow, dangerous, and false. [I think he is going back on the Bible.] If we suffer from the operation of the wise laws which govern the universe for the general good, the compensation will come hereafter. This earthquake teaches the littleness of our power and knowledge, and our dependence on him." If he would leave out "him," and say "ourselvs," I think it would sound more sensible.

The God above us faileth,
The God within is strong.

He continues: "The very fact that this is the result of a great law givs us absolute confidence, for just as sure as summer follows winter, and seed-time follows harvest, so surely has this danger passed by, and we are not to look for a recurrence until two winters come in one year." But he was mistaken, for it was repeated on the 21st of September, and, according to Wiggins, will occur again; and maybe it has shaken another ray of light into his reasoning apparatus, and he will think God did not even make the law.

EULAH C. STILLWELL.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

MR. EDITOR: In expressing thanks for the able explanations of the evolution theory of formations, by Mr. Charles Watts, published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I hav to regret his omission to explain the cause of the discrepancy between his theory and facts as they exist in nature. The evolution theory of formation logically assumes that evolution began with the beginning of matter and can end only with the ending of matter, which is quite probable, for if matter never had a beginning evolution should not hav had. The evolution theory of formation, if correct, should logically fill the earth with monstrosities in every conceivable stage of transition from the lower to the higher formations. Instead of that, we find that not only the several species, but the several varieties of the same species, are so strongly marked that we can distinguish them at a glance, and like invariably begets like.

The fact that all mammals hav a root—called the navel-string—attached to them at birth, through which they drew their sustenance while forming, is suggestiv that they originally grew out of the ground, as the Bible theory informs us they did. The navel-string would hav been formed in the stems of the plants that bore them, and their bodies then formed in bolls growing upon the stems. When the embryos had grown to maturity they burst their bolls and walked forth in due time and propagated their species as they now do. They being the only seeds of the plants that bore them, no more plants of that genus should hav grown from the ground. The whale, being a mammal fish, should hav been the product of a marine plant growing at the bottom of the sea. The growth of the animals, from the germs, being a subsequent or secondary formation, their primary formation should hav been completed when their germs were formed, and, although the primary creation was completed, there should not hav been a man to till the ground until men had grown from the ground, by the usual process of nature, which should require as much time originally as now. The Bible theory distinctly asserts that the work of creation was completed when the seeds were in the ground before they grew. Moreover, it is well known that warm-blooded formations cannot be incubated except in a temperature about equal to the blood-heat of such formations, which temperature could not hav existed in our planet except when it was first formed, and all warm-blooded formations should hav come into being soon after, or never by any known process of nature. The Bible is ahead yet; try again.

J. A. TUTTLE.

NEWARK, Sept. 7, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav often heard Roman Catholic priests remark that a little education is very dangerous. They are not so fearful of education as they are of a little exercise of intelligence, and if the people dare use one spark of that commodity contrary to the priest's interest, he will punish them, the next time they come to confession, for daring to presume to do a little thinking for themselvs. Jesuits detest free schools, free speech, free thinkers, and Freemasons, and warn their faithful subjects to beware of these latter wretches, for they are imps of the devil, and will lead them to hell. They hav declared to me that the laws of this country are not founded on the laws of God, but by godless heretics, and that the Catholics are in duty bound to resist, and when they become strong, to overcome heretics.

The state claims the right to educate her children; to make them intelligent, patriotic citizens. But Rome says, "No; hands off till we hav first christened, then confirmed, and finally schooled them to be loyal to the pope." When they hav graduated from popery, they become aliens to the land of their birth. Their loyalty belongs only to Rome; their country is no consequence. Now, sir, that is the first issue that has got be settled by the American and intelligent foreigners, and politicians and the rest of the demagogs had better take warning. The Jesuits are driven from Europe, and they are colonizing every large city in our country.

They are hungry, and want our revenues. They hav collected half of them for years, but they want the whole, of course. The people are complaining of hard times, and great numbers don't know what affects them. When you tell them there is too much dead church property, they laugh with innocence, and tell you if it were not for the churches people could not liv and there would be no law or order—thereby proving that such people hav no sense, no manhood, no courage, and are willing to be slaves to the church, with its strange Gods, Ghosts, Virgins, and saints. I answer such people that ignorance is a curse, and it is not a folly to be wise. I, for one, don't want to be taxed to suppo t a lot of lazy, idle beats who were born tired, who preach faith, hope, and charity. They hav plenty of faith, and hope—and cheek, that's about the size of it, but charity none. The fools are supposed to hav a double share of that. If they don't giv, I pity their corrupted souls, that can only be purged of their corruption by paying their money. The pope, cardinals, bishops, priests, monks, and sisters all liv by purifying and fumigating souls. It pays well. They are all looking fat and healthy. Wherever there are mills, factories, or workshops, there also you will find the costly cathedral, with its golden cross, the emblem of superstition and slavery, and inside are the priestly wolves, who are ever ready to ring the lambs to mass to rob them of their wages. Money was not earned by prayers, but by work—blood, bone, and muscle. Instead of blessing the people, they curse them. The priests are the only ones that are benefited by prayer. They are idle gods, and intelligent people get along without them; and fools could, too, if they only would take off the hoops that priests put on their heads to suppress their intellect. These priests not only rob the people of their money, the mothers and daughters of their virtue, but they rob our youths of reason and fill their heads with superstition, and build prisons to put poor, demented maidens in, there to eke out a miserable life of misery and suffering. And politicians hav not the courage to demand these lords and sanctified beats to open wide their convent doors for inspection. The cowardly rascals will legislate against Mormons, but dare not raise their corrupted breaths above a whisper against Rome. The patriotism, chivalry, courage, and love of country of the Americans hav departed, and those noble qualities are replaced with corruption, servility, poverty, and cowardice.

If our politicians want office, they take off their hats to the Irish popish bosses of both political parties, and beg them to take pity on their superannuated carcases and giv them a little office. They hav not the courage to demand it as their birthright. The Jesuits are ruling the country and sending the plunder to Rome for a foreign pope, and to support and enrich aristocratic Italian cardinals, living in ease and luxury. How long the people will submit to be ruled by politicians I know not, but there will come a time when forbearance ceases to be a virtue. That time is near, and those robbers had better take warning, for the signs are against them.

W. W. MORRIS.

ST. CLAIRSVILLE, OHIO, Sept. 4, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: As I remarked before, this is an orthodox community, and hence your readers will not be surprised to learn that Christian customs do here obtain.

During the past two or three years a worthy minister of the Calvinistic school has been dispensing gospel fables for the edification of two adjoining congregations, for which service he received the sum of one thousand dollars. In vulgar parlance, the parson had a "snap." His family was small and not necessarily expensiv; his dwelling and adjoining grounds were of course furnished gratis, and his labors in his master's vinyard were far lighter than those of most of his members, who received on an average less than half as much money therefor as himself. In addition to his salary, he received substantial support in the way of an occasional load of coal or hay, or assistance in the harvest of his crops. Not long since, the parson received a "call" to the presidency of a neighboring college, the salary offered being twelve hundred dollars. After mature reflection he accepted the position, not, we presume, for the sake of the increased salary, but doubtless to rid himself of the charge of several scores of lukewarm souls. He had become weary, perhaps, of preaching to empty pews, and longed for a change of scene. At all events, he resigned his double-barreled pastorate and cordially invited the members of his respectiv flocks, with their sisters, aunts, and cousins, to attend a reception at the parsonage on a certain day. He said "reception," but his flock seemed to misconstrue the term into "donation party," for when the eventful day arrived charitable Christians wended their way from all directions to the parsonage laden with baskets full of choicest eatables.

Now, the question naturally arises, What became of the supply of good things provided for the occasion by the benevolent parson? As he had announced a reception, he certainly did not expect the guests to provide their own refreshments, yet I hav not heard of any victuals being wasted or distributed among the poor. It is, therefore, fair to presume that the parson anticipated a "surprise" donation party and hence did not provide for the occasion, except to furnish a dessert of ice-cream and lemonade. After the guests and their "host" and his family had feasted on the edibles furnished chiefly by the guests, some charitable person, with more sympathy than judgment, started a subscription-paper through the crowd soliciting contributions for the "needy" family of this man of God. Result, thirty-five dollars, which the parson accepted with thanks from his misguided admirers, thus exemplifying the sordid greed which everywhere characterizes the leaders in the three-cornered scheme of salvation. Here was a man receiving an exorbitant sum for labors which, in the judgment of many weightier men, are not only wasted, but a positiv injury to society. Within the bounds of his pastorates are living many families who lack the bare necessities of life, yet this gilt-edged pauper accepts without a conscientious pang the charity of his infatuated dupes. Not only did they pay him a thousand dollars a year, with the use of a beautiful home thrown in, but they made donation parties for his benefit, provided him occasionally with free fuel and feed, and when he was ready to move to a better-paid position they harnessed their teams and furnished free transportation for his family and goods.

Is it any wonder that so-called Christianity is losing its influence among many intelligent, thoughtful people? Our ministers are constantly canting about free salvation, but if you will closely observe the modus operandi by which it is dispensed you will conclude that it is an exceedingly high-priced commodity.

Some time ago, in a letter to a neighboring daily paper, the writer alluded, in condemnatory terms, to the spirit of religious intoleraunce which prevails to such a deplorable degree in all orthodox communities. He asserted that such a spirit was a disgrace to nineteenth century civilization, and closed with the proposition that a decent, honest Infidel was worthy of public respect and patronage. In the same letter he denounced church fairs, and showed that the employment of such means to raise money for religious purposes is inconsistent with the professions of Christians and the example of Christ himself.

When this letter appeared a holy howl ascended heavenward from a score of orthodox throats. Some of my clerical friends almost rent their linen in giving expression to their outraged feelings. Everywhere the voices of rebuke were heard, and the hardened sinner who wrote the letter was mercilessly abused—verbally and at long range. An answer was designed by a "classical" scholar, but for some reason it never appeared. As my expressions had so shocked my orthodox friends, I thought it proper to afford them an opportunity to convince me of my error, and accordingly, in a subsequent letter, I stated that if any of my offended friends felt impelled to lead me into the path of righteousness they could do so by convincing me that I was wrong, and in order to so convince me they could meet me personally or enlighten me through the columns of the paper in which my first article appeared. No response was received, and I infer from their prolonged silence that my Christian friends, not wishing to cast their precious pearls before Infidel swine, hav decided to leave me severely alone.

I heard the erratic and bombastic Sam Jones the other Sunday, and was highly amused by his abuse of his misguided sisters and brothers, the Calvinists. He denounced the doctrin of election, and mercilessly assailed his fellow-Christians in high places for licensing the sale of whisky.

Sam preaches excellent morality and appears to be sincere, and if he would repudiate the myths and fables of the Bible he might prove a useful member of society. The fact that he appears sincere and says he believes in the hell, heaven, and God of the Bible is to many of his more enlightened hearers conclusiv proof of a lack of intellectual profundity.

MR. EDITOR: The time has come when I feel it my duty to write a few words for the sake of our Missouri friends, a great many of whom are too timid to speak their sentiments, as in part is my failing; but in looking through the county paper my attention was called to the following article, which is the writing of a little, one-horse Baptist preacher that has lately arrived from the state of North Carolina. (Put the darned thing in here.)

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.

To the Editors of The Times:

It is hoped that the time is not far distant when the opposers to religious training in the schools will find that they hav been choosing darkness rather than light, and those who are in favor of right religious training of the youth of our land will come boldly to the front and stand face to face against secularism or denominationalism in education. We are as much duty bound to giv proper training to the heart as well as the mind, and it is justly due to God and to humanity that religious training should be given in the schools while other faculties are being developed. But there seems to be almost a prevailing element in the West hostil to anything but secularism entering the curriculum of the schools. Foreign element is continually swelling the tide of secularists, and this element is strongly backed by the press. Some are so lenient as to think that religion in education is the same thing as sectarianism in education; hence they take advantage of the freedom afforded to citizens of our government and say that religion should be discarded in the schools and giv to all classes a fair and just treatment, but that is reductio ad absurdum, good only to be given to the mules and bats.

It might justly be considered an outrage on civilization, for the standard of civilization is raised only as the standard of religion is raised. Whenever secularism supersedes religion in schools the doors are simply thrown open for the entrance of Infidelity, and the people, straining at a gnat, swallow a camel.

The question is asked, What religion is to be taught, as there are so many so-called religions? We answer, there is but one religion but a multiplicity of opinions respecting that religion. That is the religion of Lord Jesus Christ, as taught to us through the words of eternal truth. We want no sectarianism, no creeds or catechism whatever in the schools, but only urge that while the mind of the child is being shaped and its character molded, these be shaped and molded in a religious principle. Those who deny their children the privilege of religious training take away a great part of their children's rights—rights given to them by God himself No one has any more right to shut off those God-given rights than they hav to keep away the supplies of life. God not only makes it incumbent upon parents to look after and supply the temporal wants, but to look after the spiritual interests of their children. Every child is given a religious instinct, or God-trust, susceptible of infinit expansion, and they need the food of religious conversation and surroundings, and a careful Christian culture. Young animals cannot appease their hunger on a barren desert, neither can a child's soul satisfy its hunger if its surroundings contain no food on which it can feed. Then if the Bible and devotional exercises are excluded from the schools the nutritious supply of soul-food is cut off and the soul is left to feed, as it were, upon mere husks.

Then we ask, How can anyone conscientiously keep away religious training from their children during their school-days, and allow the devil to squatter-sovereignty through all those years, working to the utmost his fearful and fatal mischief? Children are God's gifts, and, like all other gifts, may be made a curse or a blessing; and "Oh, that I might hav seen his kind look when he said, 'Let the little ones come unto me!'" Sad, sad will be the account to which many parents will be called in the last day for such willful neglect of their children's education. To educate the youth of our country without any recognition of the existence of God is to fail in a most sacred duty to them, and a duty, not less sacred, to our country. The fruits of secularism can be nothing more than a godless and lawless spirit which would soon ripen into Anarchism. Let us then hav more religion in education and save the children, and by so doing save the country.

B. D.

Aug. 27, 1886.

When I read it I think of an expression I heard, "Oh, giv that bird a worm!" Poor fellow, he says it is hoped that the time is not far distant when we will giv way! But he ought to hav said he hoped the time was close at hand when we would hire poor, little, single-hand preachers only to teach our public schools, as a mining region is a poor place for a beggar (plenty of work) to loaf around, and gambling is prohibited in our state. This paper (the Neosho Times), which this pitiful, little one-horse preacher has appealed to, is a county paper of the same county in which I am a teacher, and if he can induce the patrons to require the Bible taught in school, it will giv employment for more hypocrits, as it would be a contract that no peace and liberty loving man would sign. I, a Liberal, am teaching a school where I am now employed for the third term, and, it is said, hav given the best satisfaction that has been given in the district. Now, this district is composed of Methodists, Baptists, Dunkards, Campbellites, Catholics, and Liberals, yet I am getting along as smooth as a shingle. But if such a law were to be enforced (no danger), I would hav a certificate to sell at half-price.

In my school we discuss such subjects as the sounds of letters, principles of arithmetic, degrees of latitude and longitude, geography, history of the United States, etc. Not one word is ever mentioned about religion in my school. I leave that for the parents to suit themselvs in, for, even if I did believe in ghosts, what kind of a ghost story could I fix up to please them all?

Now, maybe you don't understand exactly why I call this man a one-horse preacher, but it is simply this—his faith is insignificant and one-horse in comparison with all the leading denominations. And if he knew it as well as I do, he would know that to establish one religion would destroy his entirely, which he would oppose in the end. For, my friends, to undertake to establish a religion will, in my opinion, end in a war and the triumph of the Catholic faith. I will giv you my reasons for it. The Protestants will first wish to bring the so-called holy Bible to the lead in all things, which we will oppose, as smart, liberty-loving people ought to. The Catholics will oppose it as hard as we will, besides the aid that will be furnished from European nations where Catholicism is the prevailing religion; and, as might be expected, both parties will incline to drift together in the struggle to maintain our liberty, and once the orthodox religion is conquered the Catholics will never stop till they gain their point, if we don't repress them. And I regard such writings as this preacher's as being treason to our United States Constitution and government, and all men that write such stuff as traitors. For there is no excuse for a man not understanding the Constitution, which is the most precious document ever written. Brother-Liberals, let us cling to the Constitution like the monkey to the dog's tail at "The Garden of Eden."

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Twin Sisters.

I know two little girls,
With sunny hair in curls,
And bright and laughing eyes
Blue as the summer skies.
They are twin sisters two,
And hav a sister Lou,
A sweet baby brother,
A father and mother,
A cat and three kittens,
That never wore mittens,
A dog white and curly
That never was surly,
A parrot that can talk,
And a doll that can walk.
Not many girls of nine
Hav everything so fine.
Good and kind Elodie
Is unlike twin Rhoda.
One loves mamma truly;
One I think unruly.
One is thoughtful and kind;
The other will not mind.
One brings the dressing-gown
For papa, when from town
He returns aweary.
How pleasant and cheery,
Be it early or late,
Is the chair by the grate,
With the gown upon it,
Waiting him to don it;
Slippers by the fender,
While, so neat and tender,
Near him stands Elodie.
"Kiss for me and Rhoda, Dearest papa," she said,
"Before we go to bed."
He gave her one and many,
But to Rhoda not any.
She only wanted candy,
In his pocket handy,
So she pushed sister Lou,
And struck the baby too,
And pinched good Elodie,
So selfish was Rhoda,
So anxious for it all
That mamma had to call
And order her to bed.
"I am so grieved," she said,
"So very grieved and sad
That Rhoda is so bad!"
Then Elodie good and handy
Divided the candy,
Bade mamma not sorrow—
She'll be good to-morrow.
You can't believe I jest
When I say I love best,
Much better than Rhoda,
Dear little Elodie. SADIE A. MAGOON.

Lead Pencils—How They Are Made.

[We all use lead pencils more or less, and the following account of how they are made, taken from the Brooklyn Eagle, is interesting reading.]

The consumption of lead pencils in this country is estimated at 250,000 a day. This is at the rate of one per day to every 160 of population, or about 78,000,000 a year. Graphite, which is the softest substance dug from the earth, is taken in the lump direct from the mouth of the mine to the reducing mill. Here it is pulverized by stamps under water, the particles floating off with the water through a series of tanks. It comes to the factory in Brooklyn in barrels, in the form of dust. The powder is lusterless and of a dingy color. It is finer and softer than any flour, and can be taken up in the hand just as water can, but is hardly retained more easily than water is. If one attempts to take a pinch of it between the forefinger and thumb it is as evasiv as quicksilver, and the only sensation left is that the flesh is smoother than before.

The first process in manufacturing is to separate the graphite dust further, according to fineness. It is mixed with sufficient water to run very freely, and is then turned into a hopper, from which the water runs slowly through a series of tubs. The coarsest and heaviest particles settle to the bottom of the first tub, the next coarsest and heaviest in the next, and so on, the movement of the water being made very gentle. On reaching the last tub the powder, being twice as heavy as water and sinking in it if undisturbed, has so far settled that the water discharged at the top is nearly clear. After the flow is stopped and the powder allowed to settle, the clear water is withdrawn by removing successivly, beginning with the upper one, a number of plugs inserted in holes in the side of each tub, care being used not to agitate the contents so as to disturb the deposited dust. This being done properly, the deposit is removed through the gates at the bottom of each tub. The separation is thus performed by this ingenious process of "floating" more perfectly than it could be by any direct handling, dry treatment being wholly impracticable. For the finest pencils the deposit from the last tub only is used, but for ordinary or cheap grades that from the two before the last will answer.

The graphite is now ready for the clay. This is a peculiar pipe-clay from Germany. After being subjected to the floating process the finest is mixed with the graphite, in proportions varying according to the degree of hardness required. The more clay used, the harder the pencil. For medium grades the proportion is about seven parts clay to ten parts graphite by weight. The graphite and clay are mixed together with water, to the consistency of thick cream, and the mixture is fed to the grinding mills, which consist of two flat stones, about two feet in diameter, placed horizontally, only the upper one running. Between these the mass is ground like paint, for the finest pencils as many as twenty-four times, thus securing the most perfect strength, uniformity, and freeness from grit in the leads. After grinding the mass is inclosed in stout canvas bags, and the clear water forced out by hydraulic pressure until it becomes a thick dough. It then goes to the forming press. This is simply a small vertical iron cylinder, having a solid plunger, or piston, driven by a screw. A plate is inserted in the bottom, having an opening of the shape and size of the lead desired, and the graphite is slowly forced through the hole, exactly as water is forced from a syringe, coiling itself round and round like a coil of wire on a board set beneath the press. The coil is taken up at intervals, "rove" off straight by the hands into lengths sufficient for three heads, which are straightened out, laid in order on a board, and pressed flat by putting a cover over them. They are finally hardened by placing them in a crucible and baking in a kiln. The handling must be done expeditiously, as the leads begin drying immediately and become brittle as they dry; but on first issuing from the press they are so plastic that knots may be tied loosely in them.

The leads are now ready for the wooden case. For the cheapest pencil, pine is used, and for the common grades, an ordinary quality of red cedar. At the saw-mills the cedar is cut into blocks about seven inches long, and these are sawed into strips about three and a half inches wide and three-sixteenths of an inch thick. The pencil consists of two parts glued together, with the lead between. Each strip is wide enough to make the halves of six pencils. The pencils are made six at a time, and the imperfect strips are put together so as to make a full strip of the parts. When these boards (which are now ready for shaping) reach the factory they are first passed in a continuous line under a cutter which cuts six little grooves, round or square, for the leads, and smooths the faces by the same stroke. The lead in the foreign pencil lies wholly in one-half of the wood, the other slip being put on as a cover, as nearly everybody has had occasion to know by the covers coming off and leaving an unpleasantly flat surface; but the American method has the groove equally in each strip. Accordingly, the two strips are glued alike.

Filling the leads is done by girls sitting at brass-covered tables. The first takes a grooved slip with her left hand and a bunch of leads in her right. Spreading these out in her fingers like a fan, she dextrously lays them in the grooves and passes the filled slip to the girl at the left, who puts over it another slip, which has just received a coating of hot glue from a brush wielded by a third. Any two slips fit together, and the united pairs are laid in a row and pressed together in an iron frame by a screw, and the row of slips is left to dry. The rough end of the slips and the projecting parts are next ground smooth against a wheel covered with sandpaper, and are then ready for the most interesting and characteristic process of all—that of separating and shaping.

The foreign maker still makes each pencil separately. His glued slip is one pencil, and he formerly shaped it by hand, but now does that by a plane driven back and forth by machinery. Yet it is still one at a time with him, and after shaping his pencil he has to smoothen it with sandpaper. Not so in the American factories. The work of separating and shaping them is done by the same operation of a single machine. The slips are fed one by one under a revolving cutter, which separates and rounds them on one side by cutting away the superfluous wood. As they come from under the cutter they are turned over and passed under a second one, which does the same work on the other side, so that they fall into a basket in a continuous stream, six wide, of finished pencils. The familiar operation of planing is essentially that of cutting with a pocket-knife. The planing machine, on the contrary, uses revolving knives, which make a succession of little gouges in the wood. These gouges, which would otherwise leave the surface very irregular, are made to leave it tolerably smooth by following one another so closely that the gouges become one long gouge or cut, but usually the board is not smooth enough to answer for nice work without further finishing. Yet so perfect is the operation of these revolving cutters that they leave the surface not only true, but so smooth that the finest sandpaper in ordinary use would scratch it. The machine separates and shapes probably fifty pencils while the foreign maker is making one, and requires nobody to complete its work. As the stream of pencils fall six abreast they are finished in point of utility, and are ready to be sharpened and put to use.

Before they leave the room, and several times afterwards, they are counted by means of a counting-board. This is merely a board on which are fastened two strips of wood about four inches apart, having in each strip 144 grooves. Catching up a handful of pencils, the workman rubs them along the board once and back, thus filling all the grooves, the pencils lying in them as a pen lies in its rack on the inkstand, and he has counted a gross of twelve dozen without possibility of making a mistake, and in five seconds' time. By a similar device the employment of a tray having a number of round depressions of the size of a coin, into which the pieces are shaken, gold coins are sometimes counted.

In deference to custom and the habit of associating the desired blackness of the leads with that of the wood, the natural beauty of the cedar is concealed in the standard commercial grades by coloring. After being immersed in dye, the pencils go to the very curious little varnishing machines. From a little hopper they settle through sidewise, and are seized between two wheels, which thrust them endwise, one at a time, through a hole in a tube wet with varnish from above. Each pencil, pushed on by its follower in the single file movement, emerges from the tube and drops on a horizontal belt. It then moves slowly with the belt some thirty feet, drying as it goes, and when the belt, reaching the pulley, releases it, it drops to the basket. If you place a pencil in the mouth, pushing it well back, and then, compressing the lips tightly on it, expel the air, it will shoot out with some force. In a similar manner this comical little machine spits out from its cylinder a stream of pencils at the rate of one hundred per minute.

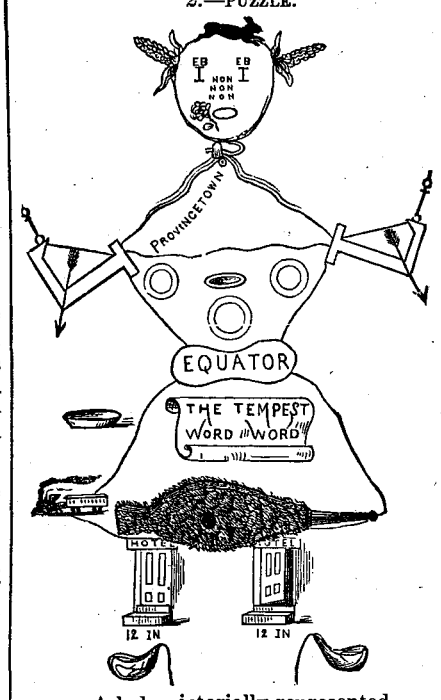
The other operations are of minor consequence, consisting of shaving a little from the ends, sharpening certain styles on a wheel, stamping each other style with its proper marking, and the various manipulations in packing. The patent package is a stroke of inventiv genius. The dozen pencils are grouped, each in its respectiv groove, around an oval piece of wood. The oval package is more showy than the round, and eight pencils can be slipped out and replaced at will without disturbing it. The same mechanical skill runs all through the work, all the pencils being uniform in size, length, and finish, and even the stamp falling on all in the same relativ position.

Except the lead-makers and the attendants on the shaping machines, the operators are girls, the machines being so automatic that neither strength nor skilled labor is requisit. The work is singularly cleanly. The shaping machines are covered with a metallic hood connecting with pipes through which all the shavings and dust are sucked down by a blower to the engin-room, where they are used for fuel. Thus the floors are kept free from litter. The work is in no respect unhealthful, and the factory is peculiar in being permeated by the aromatic odor of the red cedar.

Where Heaven Is.

Mr. Mackay, the poet, tell us in two lines where heaven is. It is in no particular place, but just in the heart that knows how to make it. The boy or girl who never frets; who keeps a sunny, merry temper, and who tries to make other people happy all day long wi l make something very much like heaven wherever he or she may be. Mr. Mackay says:

The world is full of beauty as other worlds above;
And if we do our duty, it might be full of love.



Our Puzzle Box.

1.—NUMERICAL ENIGMA.

In one and two a pronoun see;
An other pronoun, one, two, three;
One, two, three, four—adverb of place;
In three, four, five a color trace.
A palindrome is two, three, four,
Adverb of time and means "before."
Four, five, six, and seven, I hint,
Is to make copy fit to print;
But just reverse it and 'twill be
The ebb and flowing of the sea.
"On five, six, seven," is French, "they say"—
In vain you ask what folks are "they."
Seven, eight, nine, and ten, my child,
Is not wild, but "gentle, mild."
Eight, nine, ten, eleven, I see,
Is "truth," and "truly, may it be."
The twelfth before first four we trace,
And form an adverb thus of place.
The whole—or land, cash, railroad shares—
Is property that goes to heirs.

WHAT'S TO BE DONE?

A NIHILISTIC ROMANCE.

By N. G. TCHERNYCHEWSKY. With a portrait of the Author. Translated by BENJ. R. TUCKER.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

Obituary.

Died at Newark, N. J., on the 11th ult., Mattie G., wife of Cornelius A. Marshall, aged 39 years, 9 months, and 4 days. The Newark Daily Advertiser says: "Mrs. Mattie G., wife of Cornelius A. Marshall, who died at No. 58 Fifth avenue, on the 11th inst., was a daughter of the late Abijah H. Douglas, who was for many years engaged in the music business in Cedar street. She attracted the friendship of those whom she met, and possessed the happy faculty of retaining their esteem. She bore her painful illness with true heroism, and could the exercise of sheer will power hav availed, she would hav successfully combated her malady."

Mrs. Marshall had been suffering most of the time since the first of this year, but she had occasionally been able to go out of doors until four weeks previous to her death.

Her husband was by her side most of the time for the past seven or eight months. She was the mother of Cora Jewell Marshall, who has occasionally sent a communication to the Children's Corner.

She was a member of the Newark Liberal League, and took part in the first anniversary of the League, in February, 1878, singing a duet, etc., with her husband, who presided at that meeting as vice-president, in the absence of the president.

The trio—father, mother, and daughter—hav been activ in the cause of universal mental liberty ever since. Mr. Marshall is at present secretary of the Newark Liberal League.

Mrs. Marshall thought to liv well here was her duty, and had no fears of an awful punishment for not believing in Jesus as her savior. To do her duty here was her savior.

The funeral was held at her late resi lence, 58 Fifth avenue, Newark, on Tuesday, September 14th, at 3 o'clock P.M.

Thaddeus B. Wakeman, Esq., of New York; Frank T. Ripley, of Boston, and Dr. E. V. Wright, of Soho (near Newark), took part in the exercises, as follows: Voluntary, organ, Mr. H. H. Duncklee; reading of "Thanatopsis," by Dr. Wright; hymn, "Adieu," by quartet choir.

Mr. Frank T. Ripley then made some remarks, and read a poem, entitled, "It Is Well."

Mr. Wakeman made an address, of which we hav space for only this outline·

Friends of the departed one!

This is all sad, very sad. There is not a heart here but aches to relieve in some way this bitterness of grief. To do this we must come willing to giv, to repair, and to receive.

We must giv freely of our sympathy to those upon whom the crushing weight of this affliction has fallen. That is our first duty, for the sympathy which makes grief a common burden relieves those upon whom it first falls. When a great weight falls upon a relativ, friend, neighbor, or even a stranger, how instinctivly do all hands reach out to raise it from him, and how much each hand relieves the strain! Thus the tears of a common love and sympathy relieve the burdened heart, and slowly wash away the barriers that for a time cut off the afflicted from the rest of the world. Let this sympathy connect this special grief with the common fatality of man as has been done in the splendid "Thanatopsis" we hav just heard. Let us consider death, not as the king of terrors, but, stripped of all superstition, as the inevitable, and in the end beneficent, harvester of nature, to which the good and wise will ever submit with a resignation that ennobles while it afflicts, because it ever consecrates to a higher life.

To repair is the next duty that falls upon us here as friends and mourners, for though death may in the end be a necessary and beneficent process of nature, if we can cast the eye over the whole of things, it is no less a calamity to those immediately touched. To repair, therefore, as far as possible the terrible loss which has fallen upon this stricken household should be our immediate care. From it the wife, mother, sister, and friend beloved, ever kind, tender, and beneficent, is about to be borne never to return. Alas! what a void is left! Great and terrible as her worth was precious and inestimable! Yes, the duty to repair this loss to each member of this family is the sacred duty of the friends and mourners here. Had a bolt from the sky fallen and torn asunder the happy home, how readily would each and all rush to the aid of the injured and bereaved! Like such a stroke death leaves broken and lacerated lives and affections. The very nerves of life are torn when the mother and wife, the center of the family and home, is stricken down. To their friends and relativs comes the duty to gather up and weave anew the broken threads of life. They may not say it in words, but the father, daughter, sister, need now the common aid and care which only loving hands and hearts can bestow. Such let their silent grief receive by every grateful office and service within your power.

Finally, we are here to receive. Let us bear in mind that we come to the house of mourning, not only to giv of our sympathy, to repair by our aid, but to receive the soul-life of the departed, and to contribute to its immortality. Every religion has its own immortality, but civilization and humanity hav now reached so far that rarely now do priests or churches dare to assert that the worthy on this earth can fail of a worthy sphere for the continuance of their life, power, or influence. Our departed friend cherished among her friends those who entertain almost every phase of belief and hope in regard to the form of the future life. The charm of goodness held in firm attraction to her the Positiv scientist, the trusting Christian, and the assured Spiritualist. Was it not a blessed life which now enables each one of that widely varying circle of friends to feel assured that in her earthly days she had entered upon the path that must end now in their heaven? She had earned the key of the good and faithful which opens the gate to every paradise.

Thus the Positiv scientist gratefully receives and cherishes her life on earth as an influence and power ever continuing here for good. The whole community who knew her has been and will continue to be blessed by her goodness and grace. This is a grateful reception of her life here by which it is incorporated into the lives of the living, and becomes the foundation of an assured immortality. The first circle of every heaven is thus formed in the hearts who receive and continue the life and soul which has vanished from sight. This duty now chiefly falls upon the little band of Liberals in this city, with whom her life was associated as a member. The good and beautiful which she realized to you must become a part of your higher life and power. Death has been for you the harvester of this noble life. Let it be for you a permanent treasure and a consecration to a higher life!

Nor should the Christian here mourn the departed as without hope. He who is believed to hav said, "Inasmuch as ye hav done it unto the least of these ye hav done it unto me," cannot fail to know his own, whether they were accustomed on earth to cry "Lord, Lord!" or not.

Some of her friends who hav faith in modern Spiritualism are now present sharing our griefs and speaking their hopes with ours. They testify in words more fitting than mine can possibly be their assurance that the life so lately with us is clearer, higher, happier now, in a sphere better suited to her aspiring soul and work. Thus all unite in a common act of reception and grateful hope. All hav brought their tribute of tears, love, gratitude, and admiration. The worthy and faithful woman, as daughter, wife, mother, friend of all, and especially of the poor, the afflicted, and the unfortunate, has not lived in vain and cannot fail to liv forever. Her victory is assured and is eternal. Well might she say, as she did, "I am ready to go." Thankful, then, let us be that it was ours to share for a few years the sunlight of her noble, beautiful presence. My own acquaintance was limited and only at intervals, but never has a more delightful vision or a more blessed influence fallen across my path. Still stronger are the expressions of those who knew her best. Good and true, patient and serving, her life was a blessing to all it reached, and such it shall continue forever!

Husband, daughter, sister, relativs, friends! be comforted, and thankful that such a life has been, and been yours to know and enjoy.

Let the circle of heavenly influences commencing here in your hearts go on ever increasing through every sphere and form of the immortal! Let those to whom the duty is committed now bear to our mother earth the remains of the beautiful form, to rest there forever amid the birds and flowers, and the music of the elements she loved so well as her companions when here.

But to the soul, the life, the influence, which beamed from that blessed, graceful form through the years of earthly life, open your hearts that they shall never die, but pass with renewed activity into the sphere of the immortal.

To this mortal form a last loving, grateful farewell! Earth to earth!

To the life immortal, in our own hearts, in the heart of man, and in every heaven that the faith and hope of our race hav conceived for the good and the true, we bid thee Hail!

Dr. Wright then rendered some verses which he had arranged for the occasion. A dirge was sung by the choir, "Where Shall We Make Her Grave?" after which her friends took the parting look at her mortal remains. Interment was made in Fairmount Cemetery.

Book Notices.

"Celestial Sonnets" is the title of a book issued by B. M. Lawrence, M.D., Hartford, Conn. It contains 128 pages, nearly the same number of songs, and about 75 new pieces of music. Some of the songs are adapted to old and popular tunes, as those of "Gospel Hymns." It is full of phrases about "Fathers in heaven," "blessings of God," and various other persons and things we don't know much about, and don't want to. Those fortunate persons who hav managed to couple Christianity and Spiritualism may find this a pleasing book. Others will perhaps prefer some of the numerous other hymn-books lately issued for the use of those embracing the new beliefs. The price of "Celestial Sonnets" is 50 cents.

Among the many new educational ideas being tested of late is the device of issuing school reading-books as periodicals, in weekly or monthly parts, with a view toward rendering them more fresh and attractiv to the scholar than the old, much-thumbed reader, which he usually knows by heart. The Interstate Publishing Co., of Boston and Chicago, issue reading-books in monthly parts, of two grades, Primary and Intermediate, at the price of 80 cents for ten numbers, $2 for one hundred numbers.

"Eureka" is the triumphant title given by Mr. R. A. Peet, of Ithaca, Mich., to the little book he has published, at the price of 25 cents, on the labor-question. He thinks he has found the remedy for existing iniquities in certain merely financial measures, manipulations of the national currency and bonded debts; etc. We think that if Mr. Peet would more deeply study his subject, and read such books as "Rational Communism" and "Social Wealth," he would see the necessity of measures broader than any regulations affecting merely the currency.

A late one of the numerous works on mind-cure which are appearing so rapidly of late is "The Christian or Metaphysical Healing." It is religious, incoherent, and worthless. This is a sample passage: "Eradicate all thoughts of physiology, drugs, laws of health, sickness, and pain, and know that God is the only panacea, divine love the only medicin. Send for a Christian healer." Also, we will add as an omitted direction, if the invalid is a lady, see that some robust male relativ is in the closet or other handy place before the Christian healer arrives. "Hints on Metaphysics," published by the Mutual Science University Publishing Co., Chicago, is a work of similar character. Probably a small number of cures of disease hav actually been effected by means of impressions made upon the mind. In nervous diseases especially this method might be of some use. But it is a matter for regret that the efforts being made by competent psychical investigators to understand and develop these and similar occult phenomena should be obstructed and dishonored by the multitudes of charlatans calling themselvs "Christian healers," "professors of faith-cure," etc. The only work on this subject worth reading that we know of is "Mind-Cure on a Material Basis," published by Cupples, Upham & Co.

The Humboldt Science Library reprints for American circulation the most valuable works of the greatest English scientists, philosophers, and Agnostics. Books costing several dollars in their original editions may in this series be obtained for a few cents. Five dollars invested in these publications would procure for one a scientific library which in finer editions would cost large sums of money to a person more fastidious as to binding and form. This series should be a great boon to the masses in this country, and they should liberally avail themselvs of the opportunity to acquire a first-class scientific training at a trifling cost. Four of the late issues we hav just received. No. 80 is "Charles Darwin; His Life and Work," by Grant Allen, an English scientific writer of the highest eminence. In it are related in succinct and clear langage the details of that great thinker's life and labors, from the first showers of Christian maledictions to the final supreme triumph; and the work is also valuable as a thoughtful review of the Darwinian doctrins. No. 81 consists of two treatises by J. Allanson Picton—"The Mystery of Matter" and "The Philosophy of Ignorance." These deal with the most fundamental problems of cause and being. The style is clear and attractiv. It is a popular prediction of the present day that in a few decades fiction and all light literature will be read no more, but be entirely superseded by the study of science. Certainly the attractivness of such works as these is calculated to giv ground to that expectation. No. 82 contains eight essays by Professor Proctor, viz.: "Illusions of the Senses, "Animals of the Present and the Past, "Life in Other Worlds," "Earthquakes," "Our Dual Brain," "A New Star in a Star Cloud," "Monster Sea-serpents," "The Origin of Comets." Professor Proctor is the scientist who is so well known for his exceptional success in making astronomy popular and acceptable with the masses. There is not a dull or uninteresting essay in this volume, and it can be said of this book, as they say of a popular novel, that "no one who has once taken it up will lay it down till he has read the last word." The next issue, No. 83, is on "Profit-Sharing between Capital and Labor." It contains a thorough history of all the instances in various countries in which this industrial method has been adopted, with accurate statistics of their operations and their results. Of the four volumes mentioned above, the first is a double number, price 30 cents; the price of each of the others is 15 cents.

The issue of the interesting weekly magazine, Science, for September 17th, comments thus upon the recent address of Dr. Moore, the eminent English physician, before the British Medical Association, on the higher education of women: "The saying, 'Educate a woman and you educate a race,' is full of promis if rightly interpreted; full of dire disaster if it be applied to the mind to the exclusion of the body. Excessiv mental labor is a cause of sterility; and whatever does, or tends to, render women infertil is prejudicial to a nation. Young women at the present time think that they must do men's work, though there is no necessity for it, and when they hav not the constitution to do a woman's proper work. If girls were more properly taught at school the true physiology of woman, this would be in a great measure stopped. We cannot turn man into a woman, nor fit him to perform a woman's duties; no more can we fit woman to perform the work and duties of a man. Dr. Moore's address deals with this all-important question from an exceedingly practical standpoint, and is singularly free from abstractions and generalities, and, if his views are to be controverted, they must be met with correspondingly practical objections. His treatment of the subject shows a large experience with the every-day life of the women of the present time, and will well repay most thorough and careful perusal." A few others of the many subjects treated are: Impurities of the atmosphere; The Charleston earthquake; The defectiv classes in the United States; Are animals happy? Ballooning and its effect on memory; Communist leanings; Science for a livelihood; An easy method of measuring the time of mental processes; The sea-serpent; Anatomical and medical knowledge of ancient Egypt; Economic statistics; Conn's "Evolution of To-day;" Sidgwick's "History of Ethics;" The psychology of reasoning. This periodical is not, as might be inferred from its being a weekly, a small or cheaply got up and unbound sheet, but a large, finely printed, and illustrated magazine, with a handsome colored cover. It thus givs weekly an issue equal to that given monthly by many periodicals of equal cost. The subscription price is $5. Sample copies may be obtained of this office.

Press Notices of Mr. Charles Watts.

Mr. Watts has a very distinct utterance and an emphatic manner which rivets the attention of the audience.—Albany Express, Sept. 12, 1885.

Mr. Watts is an able, earnest, and forcible speaker, and convinces his hearers of his sincerity.—Morning Telegram (Grand Rapids), Nov. 23, 1885.

Mr. Watts possesses great reasoning powers, a deep, strong voice, earnest manner, and concise, fluent expression, and is the most eloquent speaker that we hav had the pleasure of hearing.—Liberal (Mo.), April 16, 1885.

Mr. Watts's appeals are not destitute of fine irony, of vigorous sarcasm, of logical wit; but his strong point is in appealing to the intellect, to the judgment, the common sense, and the reasoning powers of those whom he addresses. He does not seek to beat down others by the assumption that they are either fools or knaves, but labors to show wherein he thinks them wrongly educated or mistaken. He has a power of enlisting the minds of his auditors and moving upon their feelings in such a way as to secure close attention to the end of an address of more than the average length of public lectures.—Eagle (Grand Rapids), Nov. 24, 1885.

Apart from what may be said about Mr. Watts's views, he is a remarkably fluent speaker, a keen debater, and treats both the arguments and those who hold different opinions with courtesy and respect—a lack of which is a very marked defect in the majority of those who differ in their religious Ingersoll's Lectures Complete. Bound in one volume. To meet the demand for Mr. Ingersoll's works, the publisher has had all his lectures, except the latest on "Orthodoxy," bound in one beautiful volume, in half calf, library style, and containing over 1,300 pages, which is sold at the exceedingly low price of $5. Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "Tribute to His Brother," "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the four will be forwarded to any address, for 50cts, or either one for 15cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

A STUDY.
OF
BY LEWIS G. JANES.

This book treats of the natural evolution of the Christian religion, its historical antecedents in Palestinian Judaism and Roman Paganism; investigates the history of the founder of Christianity in the light of the latest scientific criticism of the New Testament; shows that the true story of the Man Jesus, and his genuin teachings are separable from the later legendary accretions which hav confounded him with the mythical Christ, and traces the natural development of Christian dogma and ecclesiastical institutions. Complete references and full index. 320pp. 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price $1.50.

THE Brooklyn Presbytery is trying Rev. Mr. Staunton for violence to his wife, and for keeping another woman in his house against his wife's protest. Mrs. Staunton says of the trial, "I will rely in the future, as I hav in the past, on my God," not seeming aware that such conduct on the part of his saints is not only commended but enjoined by that deity.

SCIENTISTS are endeavoring to so perfect their knowledge of the laws governing earthquakes that they can predict their dates, saying that if they can do so "a valuable contribution to the insurance of human safety in earthquake regions will hav been attained." But this would be interfering with providential chastisements, and thwarting the will of God.

Odds and Ends.

PHILADELPHIA'S contribution to the Charleston sufferers is a noble one. She gives up her claim to the title of Quaker City.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL superintendent: "Now, children, tell me what heathens are." Small boy (who has been reading about the late Belfast riots): "Heathens is folk what don't fight over religion."

"MY dear children," said Deacon Bucrag, addressing the scholars, "can you tell me why you come to Sunday-school?" "'Cause our pas would wallop us if we didn't," promptly responded a small scholar.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Boston young lady (to Chicago young lady): "Young Mr. F. of your city, I understand, is a very fine interpreter at the piano?"

Chicago young lady: "Oh, yes, indeed. The manner in which Mr. F. manipulates the ivories is very much admired by the elite."

"YOUNG man," said the village editor severely, to the aspiring poet who had brought in one of his latest efforts for publication, "this poem on 'Lucy's Charms' is not bad as a whole, but that second verse beginning, 'Her eyes, my soul! Her eyes!' is certainly a most flagrant plagiarism. You'll find that in any Methodist hymn-book."

BOSWELL: "Is slang ever justifiable?" Johnson: "Yes, you dog. If a lady on entering a book-store were to inquire for Merivale's 'History of Rome,' and the clerk were to proffer her Gibbon's 'Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire,' she might with propriety exclaim, 'What are you Gibbon us?'"*

*In consideration of the brilliancy of the mot the anachronism involved in the above will be overlooked.

PARADOXICAL.

"Do you know, my dear," he said to his wife, "that there is something paradoxical about a mule?"

She replied he ought to know if anybody did, and asked him why.

"Because, although he is by nature somewhat belligerent, yet he is always backward in deeds of violence."

THE LAST RESORT.

Sweet Canada! Unto thy shores I fly

or a man to lack good sense, or him to be simple and over- t necessarily make him a bad wild and unfounded tale he nly there is no virtue in be- a swallowing every falsehood —D. M. Bennett.

n, statesman, ever labored to fit himself harder than Milton strove to qualify himself for his vocation of poet. Verse-making is, to the wits, a game of ingenuity; to Milton it is a prophetic office toward which the will of heaven leads him. The creation he contemplates will not flow from him as the stanzas of the "Gerusalemme" did from Tasso at twenty-one. Before he can make a poem, Milton will make himself. "I was confirmed in this opinion, that he who would not be frustrated of his hope to write well hereafter in lawable things ought himself to be a true poem, . . . not presuming to sing high praises of heroic men or famous cities, unless he hav in himself the experience and practice of all that which is praiseworthy."—Mark Pattison's Milton.

IT is asserted that the Old Testament narrativs contain an authentic and faithful history of the actual dealings of God with man; that the events which they relate took place as therein related, and were recorded by well-informed and veracious writers; that God, wherever he is represented as visiting and speaking to Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Samuel, and others, did really so appear and communicate his will to them; that the ark, as built by Noah, was constructed under the detailed instructions of the architect of all worlds; that the law, as contained in the Pentateuch, was delivered to Moses, and written down by him under the immediate dictation of Jehovah, and the proceedings of the Israelites minutely and specifically directed by him; that, in a word, the Old Testament is a literal and veracious history, not merely a national legend or tradition.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

LEAVING the vulgar arguments, that by learning man excelleth man in that wherein man excelleth beasts; that by learning man ascendeth to the heavens and their motions, where in body he can not come, and the like; let us conclude with the dignity and excellency of knowledge and learning in that whereunto man's nature doth most aspire, which is, immortality or continuance, for to this tendeth generation and raising houses and families; to this, buildings, foundations, and monuments; to this tendeth the desire of memory, fame, and celebration, and, in effect, the strength of all other human desires. We see how far the monuments of wit and learning are more durable than the monuments of power or of the hands. For hav not the verses of Homer continued twenty-five hundred years, or more, without the loss of a syllable or letter, during which time infinit palaces, temples, castles, cities, hav decayed or been demolished?—Lord Bacon.

THE politicians tell us, "You must educate the masses because they are going to be masters." The clergy join in the cry for education, for they affirm that the people are drifting away from church and chapel into the broadest Infidelity. The manufacturers and the capitalists swell the chorus lustily. They declare that ignorance makes bad workmen; that England will soon be unable to turn out cotton goods, or steam engins, cheaper than other people, and then, Ichabod! Ichabod! the glory will be departed from us. And a few voices are lifted up in favor of the doctrin that the masses should be educated because they are men and women, with unlimited capacities of being, doing, and suffering, and that it is as true now, as ever it was, that the people perish for lack of knowledge.—Huxley's Lay Sermons.

ON HIS BEING ARRIVED TO THE AGE OF TWENTY-THREE.

How soon hath Time, the subtle thief of youth,
Stolen on his wing my three and twentieth year!
My hasting days fly on with full career,
But my late spring no bud or blossom shew'th.
Perhaps my semblance might deceive the truth,
That I to manhood am arrived so near;
And inward ripeness doth much less appear,
Than some more timely-happy spirits indu'th.
Yet be it less or more, or soon or slow,
It shall be still in strictest measure even
To that same lot, however mean or high,
Toward which Time leads me, and the will of heaven;
All is, if I hav grace to use it so,
As ever in my great taskmaster's eye.
—Milton's Sonnets.

I WILL not leave literature. Nay, had I but two potatoes in the world, and one true idea, I should hold it my duty to part with one potato for paper and ink, and liv upon the other till I get my idea written.—Carlyle's Letters.

BELIEF is not a matter of choice, not a matter of will, but with people of good intelligence it is a matter dependent upon evidence.—D. M. Bennett.

THE TEACHINGS OF THE GOSPEL PRACTICALLY APPLIED.

Notes and Clippings.

EARTHQUAKE religion will never be worth a hundred cents on the dollar.—Sparta (Ga.) Ismaelite.

FIVE professors at Andover Theological Seminary are accused of heresy. Their offense consists in teaching that a chance may be given sinners to repent after death. Joe Cook is said to be one of the accusers.

ANSON S. WOOD, deputy secretary of state, has issued the decision that there is nothing in the laws of New York state to prevent women from voting. The woman suffragists announce their intention of participating in this fall's elections. They will support George for mayor.

A BOSTON Sunday paper recently contained the following: "Mr. F. S. sailed last week for Europe, where she has gone to make purchases for her elegant stone house now building on Beacon street. A prayer was read and a special hymn was sung for her last Sunday at the church of the Messiah."

THERE is a prayer-meeting for business men every noon in the John Street Methodist church. Two minutes are allotted to each person who desires it for testimony, exhortation, or prayer. The meeting was well attended lately. An elderly gentleman in trumpet tones spoke, and after his two minutes were up he kept right on. He had begun with a scene in King David's time, and had got down to the beginning of the Christian era, and ten minutes had gone by. Then a young man in a corner led off with the Doxology. The elderly gentleman looked amazed as all present swelled the volume of harmony. He sat down. As the meeting closed the elderly gentleman stood up, and in tones of thunder said: "That young man over in the corner will not be able to sing me down when I stand with the tens of thousands before the throne of almighty God," and he left the meeting room indignant. The young man said: "The old gentleman is evidently non compos mentis."

MR. T. V. POWDERLY, who is in Richmond attending the national assembly of the Knights of Labor, attended high mass at St. Peter's cathedral on Sunday, and after the services went, on invitation, to a meeting of the conference of St. Vincent de Paul, where he made a short speech. He said the work of the society and the work of the order over which he presided were in many respects similar in that each aimed to ameliorate the troubles of their fellow-creatures and aid and elevate mankind!

A NATIV of India who had visited England was heard by an Englishman describing the way in which he observed Christians worship, and was surprised at their lack of reverence. "With all the vivacity of an Eastern nativ," says the Church Standard, "he represented the attitude of some Christians at worship. He lounged back in his chair, crossed his legs, stretched them out at full length, looked up at the ceiling and yawned, and then asked his audience what they thought of that as a position of reverence. He polished his glasses, fixed them on his nose, and stared all round in everybody's face. He fanned himself with a piece of paper, and gaped about. He stood with his legs crossed, and his hands in his pockets, and looked across the room sideways. He sat on his chair and leaned his head forward on his hand. And after each exhibition he asked his audience what they thought of Englishmen's reverence of their God."

"No authentic picture of Christ," says the Independent, "and no trustworthy description of his appearance has come down to us. It is remarkable that the four evangelists should hav agreed in omitting just what every other biographer or novelist is careful to giv. Nowhere hav we a hint as to his personal figure or as to a lineament of his countenance. Some hav guessed that he was fairer than all the fair, and others hav presumed that his countenance was marred more than any other man; but no one knows. The conventional picture of Jesus, which seems to us his certain portrait, is not older than Michael Angelo."

THE dean of Chichester (Dr. Burgon) is unrelenting in his warfare on the new version of the scriptures. In a letter to the Montreal Church Guardian he says: "A report has reached me (I am unwilling to believe that it can be a true report, but I hav it on very respectable authority) that there is to be a proposal made at the approaching Canadian Provincial Synod to adopt that most infelicitious of recent literary performances—the 'Revised' Version of the Old and New Testaments. I take leave in the most respectful manner, but at the same time without the slightest hesitation, to warn the members of that august body against the egregious error of which they would most certainly be guilty should they, in an ungarded hour, be induced to extend their sanction to a work which here in England is deservedly regarded with universal disfavor, and by the best informed sort is already recognized as the grossest literary blunder of the age."

WE would not be unjust; we do not say that all the religious press is arrayed against labor in its struggles for justice, but the champions of truth among them are lamentably few. The vast majority of them are far too prone to cry "Anarchy," "Socialism," "Communism," when labor demands its right, and to preach that devil's doctrin, that "workingmen should be content in that position of life in which it has pleased God to place them."—Canadian Labor Reformer.

LORD LONSDALE—he is the fifth earl of the peerage—is visiting this country as theatrical manager of a performing troupe, the chief star of which is a woman who is the subject of great scandal throughout England. Yet this theatrical-managing earl has within his possession more ecclesiastical patronage than any peerage of the United Kingdom of Scotland or Ireland. In his gift are no less than fifty-nine "livings"—clerical appointments to churches. This number exceeds the number at disposal of any of the following bishops: Carlisle, Chester, Chichester, Ely, Exeter, Hereford, Liverpool, Newcastle, Rochester, St. Albans, Sodor and Man, Southwell, and Truro. Among temporal peers those who nearest approach to it are the dukes of Devonshire, with 40; Rutland, 31; Bedford, 26; Beaufort, 25; Northumberland, 24, and Cleveland, 22; the marquis of Abergavenny, 24, and Baron Leconfield, 22. The Prince of Wales also has 22. Some people think this state of affairs calls for reform. We agree with some people.—Christian at Work.

And for denying that the Bible is a safe moral guide, or that we should reverence its vile blasphemy or believe its obscene stories, in New Jersey one is liable to be arrested, calumniated, hated, and persecuted by the devotees of this Bible and followers of its holy teachings.

Christians everywhere assure us we are indebted to the Bible for our present civilization and morality; that none can be harmed by reading the holy Bible and living out its teachings, and we are bribed to do so by the promise that, if we will follow the example of God's blessed saints, we with them shall be made perfect. If we will share their faith, we shall also with them share heaven. Decency forbid!

Jacob is another exemplary saint, indorsed by Jesus as sure of heaven (Luke xiii, 28). He is introduced to us in this truthful and holy Bible as taking advantage of his blind old father, lying to him, and cruelly, treacherously, robbing his own brother (Gen. xxvii, 18, 27).

This paragon saint marries two sisters, having them both for wife at the same time, but, not content with them, takes both their hired girls also (Gen. xxx, 4, 10).

Reader, does the Bible relate these filthy stories to warn us from the wrong, the sin, of such doings? No; but the Bible indorses, applauds, the beastly infamy. It declares God blessed Leah and answered her prayers because she gave her hired girl to her husband. Read the damnable record: "And Leah said, God hath given me my hire, because I have given my maiden to my husband" (Gen. xxx, 18). How many parsons, deacons, and good Christian brethren admonish their wives to follow the example of Leah, as the best and surest way to obtain from God answers to their prayers?

Christian, despite your bigotry and blind fanaticism, answer, honestly now, Is the Bible a safe moral guide? Is it a fit book to place in the hands of your children?

You rightly denounce the Mormons for the crime of polygamy, but how can you do so and yet reverence the Bible? The Bible teaches polygamy. The Bible God enforces as well as sanctions polygamy:

"And I gave thee thy master's house and thy master's wives into thy bosom" (2 Sam. xii, 8, 11).

Surely there is no morality like Bible morality; no obscenity more gross; no blasphemy more vile.

"Now, therefore, kill every male among the little ones, and kill every woman that hath known man by lying with him, but all the women children that have not known a man by lying with him keep alive for yourselves" (Num. xxxi, 17, 18). And thirty of these young virgins, God's share, he especially commanded should be given to the priest for his especial use (Num. xxxi, 41).

For repudiating these and similar horrible teachings, and urging to discard them, and instead to live lives of justice, mercy, and purity—to seek happiness by promoting that of others, I have been arrested for blasphemy.

In all candor I ask, Who are the enemies of humanity—they who denounce or they who teach and justify such atrocities?

FALL AND REDEMPTION.

What a loving father is the Bible God! Suppose a father should place a helpless little crippled child of five years old on a chair tilted toward a large glowing fire, then give the child orders not to move or the punishment of its disobedience would be horrible death by burning. He then leaves the child, knowing it soon must move, and he has so fixed it that when it does it must fall upon the fire and be burnt to death.

Would not every sane human being execrate and denounce such a father as a monster of heartless cruelty?

We read in the Bible that God placed Adam and Eve in the garden of Eden, constituted them so they could not resist temptation, then placed temptation continually before them, knowing they must fall; to make assurance doubly sure he creates a subtle devil to beguile them, insuring their fall; then damns them for falling, and damns all the human race who had anything to do with the fall, because Adam and Eve did not resist a temptation God himself especially made it impossible they could resist. Amazing love divine! O sublimity of wisdom!

To appease his wrath and save a few of the myriads thus doomed to eternal hell on account of an act committed hundreds of years before they were born, this God plans to send his own son (as old as his father) to the earth to die, pour out his blood on the cross (which he never did, for he shed no blood till after he was dead—see John xix, 33, 34), that all who would accept this blood should be saved.

It took this God four thousand years to perfect this wondrous plan and to provide this savior; in the mean time he positively declares no savior ever has existed or ever shall exist.

"Before me there was no God formed, neither shall there be after me. I, ever I, am the Lord, and beside me there is no savior" (Isa. xlv, 10, 11).

"I am the Lord, and there is none else; there is no God beside me" (Isa. xlvi, 5).

"Yet I am the Lord thy God from the land of Egypt, and thou shalt know no god but me, for there is no savior beside me" (Hosea. xiii, 4).

There is no accredited history on earth describing the birth of this Jesus. The only accounts we have are Matthew and Luke. Luke denies that he wrote by inspiration; he declares in the first verses of his gospel he merely wrote of his own accord because there were so many gospels contradicting each other. He wanted his friend, Theophilus, to know his account of the matter. Thus we are left with the gospel of Matthew alone to afford us any inspired information as to the birth of this savior whom God said never had existed or should exist. Yet this is the all-important event on which the whole claims of Christianity depend.

Matthew was a tax-gatherer, and knew nothing of Christ until called to be a disciple A.D. 31. Yet he gives us all the particulars of what Joseph thought, as well as what Joseph dreamed (Matt. i, 18, 20). This gospel, according to Matthew, it is admitted no one knows the author of. Smith's Bible Dictionary, a standard authority among all Christians, says, in regard to the time of its writing: "The most probable supposition is that it was written between 50 and 60 A.D.; the exact year cannot even be guessed at."

It is a little peculiar that Matthew relates what he was not eye-witness to—the incarnation, visit of the wise men, the temptation, the transfiguration, the agony of Gethsemane, denial of Peter, dream of Pilate's wife, talk between Judas and the priests, etc.—while all the events said to be witnessed by John alone are omitted by John alone. Matthew tells us Joseph, discovering the condition of Mary, decided to put her away; while worrying over it he dreamed that, although Mary was about to become a mother, she was nevertheless a virgin; and this dream rendered Joseph perfectly satisfied that everything was all right. No claim is made that Joseph ever told Matthew anything about this queer dream, yet it is alleged that somewhere between fifty and sixty years after Matthew gives us this astounding revelation, and we must believe it or be damned.

Now, reader, take time and calmly think it over. A Jewish girl becomes the mother of God almighty—the mother of your God. The child of this young Jewess was God. Christ is God. God cried and screamed, squealed and kicked; God flung about his little arms; God made aimless dashes into space with his little fists; God stared foolishly at his own little toes; God smiled when he was comfortable and howled when pricked by a nasty pin; God was nursed at Mary's breast; God was wrapped in little diapers; God lay in a cradle and was rocked to sleep; God was quite sick when cutting his little teeth; God caught the measles, mumps, whooping cough, and scarlet fever; God learned to walk and often tumbled down, bumped his forehead, and made his little nose bleed; God was spanked when he was naughty, etc., etc. We have always been taught to believe that God was born in a manger, but Matthew declares he was born in a house (Matt. ii, 11; Luke ii, 7). Matthew declares that immediately after the departure of the wise men Joseph, Mary, and the child fled into Egypt and remained there till after the death of Herod (Matt. ii, 12, 14). Luke declares this was not so, but that eight days after his birth Joseph, Mary, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem; Mary did penance for the crime of motherhood, and Jesus was circumcised (Luke ii, 21, 39).

Reader, if you read such absurdities and contradictions in any other book would you regard it as divinely inspired?

What does this savior, whom God declares never had, and never should have, existence, save from?

Does he save mankind from sin? No, for men continue to sin.

Does he save mankind from death? No, for men continue to die.

Does he save our souls from death? No, for the church declares our souls are immortal and cannot die.

Does he save from torturing fires of hell? No, for the church no longer believes in a literal hell-fire.

Could this Christ save us, if there was something to be saved from?

Was Christ immortal? The church says Christ is God and therefore must be immortal, and being immortal his soul could not die.

The Bible says: "The soul that sinneth it shall die" (Ezek. xviii, 4).

If Christ came to pay the penalty, his soul must die.

The church says Christ, being God, was immortal—his soul could not die. But the Bible and Christ declare he did die (Isa. liii, 10, 12; Rev. i, 18). If these scriptures are true, Christ's soul did die. Then he could not have been God. A dead God is an absurdity. If not God, he needed a savior for himself (Rom. v, 12).

Which is it that sins, soul or body? The body! Then why does the body rest in peace in the grave and the soul go down to hell's torment?

No, it is the soul that sins! Then why did Jesus say if thy hand offend thee cut it off—if thine eye offend pluck it out: "And if thine eye offend thee pluck it out; it is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye than having two eyes to be cast into hell-fire, where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched" (Mark ix, 43–48)?

We know the body goes to the grave. Christians declare it is our soul that goes to heaven or hell. But this contradicts the Bible and Christ. Jesus says the body goes to heaven, the body goes to hell—better enter heaven with one hand, one foot, one eye, than retaining perfect body be cast into hell.

According to Christ, there will be one-eyed cripples in heaven. The Bible says so. Christian salvation goes to the vile murderer whose life is forfeited saying: "Jesus suffered for you; only have faith in the blood of Jesus and you will go to heaven, no matter how foul and infamous the life; Christianity offers to cleanse from all guilt; 'Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow'" (Isa. i, 18).

And yet Christians prove they do not believe their own or the Bible teachings. They fail to live up to their creed in their daily life. They avow faith has cleansed the murderer of all guilt; he is cleansed by the blood of the lamb and become fit company for the angels—made pure and innocent as a little child by the blood of Jesus. Yet they will not set this innocent one free; do not care to take him to their homes. Saint-like and fit for heaven as he is, they hang him just the same.

Acts are too strong for their creed. Only in an imaginary world can they imagine him in happiness.

Dear reader, we would have you, instead of believing the falsehoods of Christianity, accept the truths of Secularism.

A man who is brutal and licentious brings on himself loathsome disease, poisons his blood, and entails on his children horrible suffering and a tendency to vice. On his death-bed he believes in Jesus, goes to a pure heaven of eternal bliss, and leaves the world cursed by the consequences of his evil life while he revels in extra rank and esteem in heaven, for the New Testament declares there is more joy in heaven over such a sinner than over ninety and nine just persons that need no repentance (Luke xv, 7). The Bible and Christianity thus put a premium on vice.

Secularism warns all against wrong-doing by pointing out the misery which invariably follows evil, not alone to themselves, but to their children. Secularism teaches us to fix our eyes and hopes on earth. Parsons bemoan this, but there is not one of them but will swap eternal mansions in the sky for the smallest house and lot on this perishing earth. We have nothing to do with a home in the clouds now. Let us make a heaven of our own homes here and now, instead of devoting time and care to meet a future life. Let us prepare for it by learning how best to live this present one. Learn how to live. Death is inevitable. We need waste no time on learning how to die. One world at a time will tax all our powers to the uttermost. If there is a spirit-life, ministrations of love and lives of active benevolence and usefulness are the best possible preparation for it. If there is not, then welcome extinction; the calm, sweet sleep of eternal rest is far preferable to constantly beholding the torture of those we love, even though we ourselves have gained harps and wings.

Secularism sweeps away all the terrors of the supernatural. It bids men look on earth as their fair heritage, capable of being beautified and cultured through knowledge, skill, and love.

It brings peace and joy, for it refines, educates, teaches love and gentleness, plucks fear from the mind and sectarian hate from the heart, and makes brotherhood to all alike. "All the world is our country—to do good is our religion." Secularism gives freedom; it gave freedom to all in the United States by abolishing slavery, taught by the Bible and upheld by Christianity. In the language of that noble and fearless exponent of Secularism, Mrs. Annie Besant: "To him whose highest interest is centered in his own miserable self—to him who only cares to gain his own ends—to him who seeks only his individual comfort—to that man Secularism can have no attraction. Such a man may indeed be made religious by a bribe of heaven, but truth disdains the service of the self-seeker; she cannot be grasped by a hand that itches for reward."

If Truth is not loved for her own pure sake; if to lead a noble life; if to make men happier; if to spread brightness around us; if to leave the world better than we found it—if these aims have no attraction for us, if these thoughts cannot inspire us, then we are not worthy to be Secularists, we have no right to the proud title of truth seekers.

If you want to be paid for your good lives by living forever in a lazy, useless fashion in an idle heaven; if you want to be bribed into nobility of life; if, like silly children, you learn your lesson, not to gain knowledge, but to win sugar-plums, then you had better cling to your creeds and your churches. They are good enough for you; you are not worthy to be free.

"But those who, having caught a glimpse of the beauty of truth, deem the possession worth more than all the world beside; those who have made up their own minds to do their work faithfully, and zealously, regardless of reward, applause, or censure, they will at every sacrifice spread the gospel of Secularism among men until the minor melodies of Christianity have sobbed out their last mournful notes on the dying evening breeze, and on the fresh morning winds shall ring out the chorus of hope and joyfulness from the glad lips of men, women, and children whom Secularism has set free." Socialism in India.

What is Socialism? Socialism is that science which deals with and governs society. Every country has her own peculiar rules of government. That country must be the lowest in the scale of justice and righteousness which has inculcated principles and enacted laws for her own benefit at the expense of other nations, but that nation which has inconvenienced, nay, even ruined, her own prospects and sacrificed her interests for the good of other countries must be the highest. She has been, she is, and will be, a beckoning star to others in all paths of life. Where is such a country? The whole audience, nay, the whole world, will answer, pointing their fingers to Europe and America. Shall we find beneficent and consummate systems of administration in these countries? Let us, for instance, take the foremost and pioneering part of Europe called England and analyze her. England, you will find at a first glance, is a country where human species multiply by leaps and bounds, and draw in nourishment from four quarters like the the boa constrictor, who inhales all animals and birds within the radius of one mile. Though entirely dependent for her support on foreign lands, England is a country despotic in government and partial in distributing supplies among her subjects. She represents the lion who sucks the blood out of the veins of his prey and leaves the carcases to wolves and jackals. The gate-keepers of England are the kings and queens, who devour the lion's share of the booty snatched away from distant lands and allow the remainder to be gluttonously swallowed by their relativs, emissaries, and other pirates, who helped them to it, by plotting, and planning, and ransacking neighboring countries, and then leave the carcases and crumbs for being sent into the interior to aid the starving masses in continuing life; hence, seventy-five per cent of the population in England are paupers, who are ready to pounce on anything that comes in their way. This sinful booty is thus divided, no reason or sense being allowed to get the better of avarice and selfishness; hence came the proverb in prominence, "Necessity has no law." How can a nation be just and righteous when her law is necessity? The same principle which governs nations regulates families and modulates the tone of society, for a family is nothing but a small nation, society still larger, and the nation the largest family. When the nation is so unjustly and partially governed in regard to her supplies, the same traits are distinguishable in society, the royalty and the nobility being the law-givers and governors, and the masses the oppressivly ruled and trodden down. Laws are made by a few for the aggrandizement of many. The masses are so badly governed that they dare not assert their rights without losing life. The majority are dextrously imposed upon and assiduously kept ignorant, that the property usurped by royalty may not be encroached upon by them. They are so educated as to feel that the little crumbs they get is a favor specially conferred upon them out of pure humanitarianism and compassion; hence, a minority are possessed of property and fortune, and the majority engulfed in distress and poverty. Now, let us turn to families. They are based on the same principles which control the nation and the society. Every power and right is vested in the person who heads the family. He is the support, the guide, and the rule. The destiny of his people depends entirely upon his whims and caprices. If he wishes, he has the power to impoverish his family, notwithstanding that he has brought so many souls into existence. There is the same injustice and partiality in the distribution and division of power and property of English families as there is in the government of the nation and the society. The eldest son becomes an heir, unless otherwise willed by his father before his demise. It is very often the case that one son is enriched and nine turned out as paupers. And yet the state and the society consider it perfectly just and proper. Why should a father be so unjust and cruel toward his children? But it is so; consequently England apparently enjoys the smiles of fortune. All along the sea-coasts large and flourishing cities and towns hav been established and gigantic industries started for accumulating wealth in some few corners at the expense and starvation of millions. If the father should equally divide his property between his ten sons, it would amount to little in each hand, but by depriving nine of their rightful equal shares, he makes one son bask in the sun of fortune and nine eclipsed by adversity. And why? I ask. There is no reply to this question except, "It is my will and my pleasure." Consequently the whole of England is owned by a few aristocrats, and the masses hav not an inch of ground to stand upon as their own. Slums and alleys are filled to overflowing with wretched life teeming with misery still. Nihilists, Socialists, Communists, and Anarchists are daily rising in all directions. The protection of property and maintenance of peace hangs on their annihilation. They are, therefore, persecuted and imprisoned. But the English government forgets that the peace of society depends upon justice; the happiness of individuals hangs on the equal distribution of nature's bounty and the safe enjoyment of their possessions. The administrators make light of the truth that it is dangerous not to keep within the bounds of moderation the desires of their hearts; it is self-destructiv to cast a covetous eye on the goods of their neighbors when they ought to let whatever is theirs be sacred from their touch. Under such circumstances the masses would seem to be perfectly justified in destroying property that belongs to but a few and spreading terror throughout the length and breadth of the land. When a nation becomes mighty by injustice, partiality, and corruption, so by the law of compensation and a process of the reverse character she will be the most insignificant. If she rose by iniquity she must fall by righteousness, and that righteousness would be that every pauper in England should claim from his usurpers his equal share of the national property. Usurpers, as a rule, never yield to decisions arrived at by arbitration in recognizing individual rights, so that it would appear that all systems as they now exist should be swept away. As there is no obligation binding parents to their children except that of personal pleasure, so children owe no duties to their parents. This lawless raising of families is the root of all social evils and the cause of Anarchy and Communism.

Now take, for instance, the case of many a married man. He marries for lust, and pleads love for its starting. He therefore does not wish an increase to his family, but the union of two results in a third guest, though unsought and uncalled for. Everything concerning this unexpected guest is kept secret until his first cry heralds his arrival. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred both parents are desirous that no offspring should be the result of their union. This state of affairs confirms me in my belief that children in Western nations are unwelcome guests of the family. There is no filial bond between them. What do children, therefore, learn from parents? Nothing but sensuality and disrespect for old age. English society recognizes two factors or pillars on which the whole constitution rests, namely, husband and wife. When I was young I was often told by old people that there was but one pair of lions created by God on earth. They giv birth to two cubs, male and female, and are immediately found dead. This may not be true of lions, as we find them in large numbers in Africa. But it is true of English people. The parents do not die in the true sense of the word, but are deserted and their existence ignored when their children are united in matrimony. It is a miserable affair. No other people will do so. But the English wife often exacts from her husband the desertion of his parents, not to speak of his grandparents, uncles, and aunts, brothers and sisters, that she may be the paramount ruler of his heart and soul. If he ever shows the least affection for his parents or expresses his desire to see them, she at once sues him for separation, saying: "Why hav you married me? If you wanted to serve your parents you ought not to hav courted me. No man can serve two masters." But the result of this unnatural combination is still worse. Lust is substituted for love, secrecy and concealment allowed to brood over child-bearing; reluctance takes the place of willingness to welcome the unexpected guests, who then are brought up in sensuality and intense desires to separate from parents. Individuality is thus fostered at the sacrifice of universality. Man honorably deserts his parents and without remorse forsakes grandparents; he drives away his brothers and sisters. Why should he then care for his fellow-men? Hence in England parents sometimes liv in palaces and sons in degradation; hence in England sons are members of Parliament and parents in obscurity; hence in England brothers are managers of wealthy firms, and other brothers and sisters are rolling in slums in tattered clothes and with tottering frames; hence in England boys and girls are spoilt for life by being forced into wretched self-support at the cost of morality. In this manner one person becomes rich, reducing nine to penury; in this manner one person marries, and nine go wrong; in this manner one rules and nine become fools. In short, English society is rude, and therefore givs rise to innumerable crudities. In a country where the hight of wealth is too high, there the depth of poverty and degradation is too low. It is therefore indispensably necessary to shorten the hight of fortune in order to curtail the depth of misery.

I shall presently turn to America and see if every thing is all right here. America is not like England in many respects. England feeds on the resources of other nations and makes a ruinous return; America develops her own that other nations may look to her for cheap market. Both are therefore, in my opinion, unsound in their tendency and selfish in their desires. While England multiplies in population for the devastation of other countries, America raises enormous crops for flooding foreign markets therewith that the natural resources of other countries may be stagnated and their local industries closed. Why should America do so? Why should she raise more than she can consume? Could any of my audience explain why?

Americans, it seems to me, are well educated in principles of right and wrong, freedom and slavery, liberty and bondage, but they will not admit that it is sinful to raise more than necessary. I do not blame them, as they are not responsible for what they hav inherited from their fathers. Where did the first American settlers come from? They came from England. Their policy, like their forefathers', was that of conquest by slaughter, usurpation by force, and grasping by deception. But the consequences of such traits of character are disastrous indeed. In the long run no one is so much deceived as the deceiver. In England the supplies come from abroad, and in America from within, and yet the masses in one, and the producers in another, are equally miserable. The American farmers had enough and to spare, but as the supplies first reached royalty in England, so in America they went from producers to speculators. It is marvelous to see how, in both cases, a few intriguers managed to monopolize the profits accruing from imports and exports. In the first case, royalty, and their accomplices, swallowed the lion's share; in the second case, speculators and capitalists acted the parts of middlemen and prevailed upon American farmers and mechanics to consign their goods to them for better prices. Yes, the better prices they fetched from foreign markets, but what became of it? They were absorbed in commissions paid to agents and managers of trading-houses, so that a few hav thus become millionaires, and ninety-nine remained paupers. In England royalty, peers, and nobles hoard for themselvs the best part of everything, leaving the crumbs to the masses; in America the producers liv on husks, reserving the substance for foreign markets. They are educated to believe that their goods will fetch better prices elsewhere, but they do not know they will be used up in paying commissions. In this way the commission men become immensely rich, and form the aristocracy of America. The only difference between the aristocracies of England and America is that one is tyrannizing and the other is beguiling. One reduces the masses to starvation, and the other to the rightly merited penury. This is the case as far as the distribution of national wealth is concerned. There are more than fifty per cent of speculators in America who do exchanging business on small and large scales as their liabilities go, whereas in England, where the population increases by leaps and bounds, their number is stationary and limited. There is, however, one advantage that England has over America, and that is that all the English domineering spirits intrude themselvs as paupers upon every land, whereas the Americans dare not step out without money in their pockets.

The family system in America is English in tone and character; though, unlike the English, moveable and immovable property is equally divided among all children if there be no will made by parents. But in this country personality is so strong that almost every person has his will made, sometimes before his birth, so that in case he is unborn his will does his business as if he were born and brought up. This will mania is a terror to all. Wives and children don't know how their future destiny is going to be willed. The whole society is fixed in uncertainty as to the future issue. They therefore feel no obligation to one another. Everybody has to look out for himself; there is unceasing struggle for life from highest to lowest; parents desert their children, and vice versa. While one party is imprisoned for debt, another rolls in affluence. It is no shame to a son in good business to see his father locked up in jail. There are many Senators and Congressmen whose aged brothers are in county-houses. Sons and daughters are in penitentiaries, while mothers are wedlocked to big swells, and engaged in whiling away their time in picnics, amusements, and entertainments. Endless troubles and evils confront an observer in studying their social and religious life, which, to him, appears to hav been rotten to the core. The remarriage of widows has converted innumerable children into hoodlums, and filled towns and cities with lawless mobs. Introduction of marriage by choice and selection instead of by natural laws has driven many a man and woman to sadness and madness, nay, even to murder and suicide. Love is a misnomer. It is the estimated capital on which all lottery tickets are drawn. Such love only leads to divorces. People talk against polygamy, but the system of monogamy prevailing in America is the worst type of polygamy. GOPAL VINAYAK JOSHEE.

News and Notes.

I do not think I could hav found a better place or more congenial friends amid which to close my campaign than at West Union, O. The Liberals there are but few in the midst of a very orthodox community, but they keep up the battle gloriously, and there will be no such thing as failure at this point. I came to this quiet village—fourteen miles from the railroad—in the pleasant afternoon, and the first friends I met were Professor Stivors and Colonel Dan Eylar, and with them I enjoyed a delightful drive over this ancient land—for it was settled nearly a hundred years ago, and that makes anything ancient in this rushing new world. Before I came to West Union it had been announced with many a flourish of trumpets that a certain local preacher—and a brawny blacksmith too—was to meet me in debate, and overwhelm me with such dire confusion that in fifteen minutes I should leave the town as if an earthquake were at my heels. The first thing I did after my arrival in West Union was to call upon this formidable adversary. He wanted to see me, and, of course, I wanted to see him before entering upon this terrific combat. He came up smiling, and avowed that he wanted to giv me the grace of God. I told him I was perfectly ready for regeneration, and hoped to see him bright and early on Saturday morning for the intellectual strife, and I invited him to come to my evening lecture to get a few "points." He promised to do so, and he came and took a front seat, and listened, with about two hundred others, to my lecture on "Universal Mental Liberty." In the morning (Saturday) I went to Eylar's Grove, which was prettily decorated for the occasion, to meet this son of Vulcan, who was to deal me such vigorous blows. Alas! he had mysteriously disappeared. The grace of God, somehow, was wanting, and this preacher, who had boasted of such great things, incontinently took to his heels, and I hav not seen him since. I challenged the other clergymen of the county, but they kept a discreet silence. Not one of them dared to proclaim himself the champion of the Lord. We had good audiences, both at the grove meeting and at the court-house. I gave six lectures to very appreciativ people; and I was quite encouraged with all the signs of the times. So much interest was manifested that arrangements are already made for another Liberal camp-meeting next year, and I hav no doubt it will be a brilliant success, for the Liberals of this part of Ohio hav a way of doing things that compels the smiles of fortune. J. F. Beck is well known as an unflinching Freethinker. The orthodox hav just been making a fight about him here on the school question. He is one of the school teachers of the county, and has taught for several years. This year the orthodox party made a desperate attempt to prevent his receiving a certificate, on the ground of his Infidelity, but the Liberal party, with such bold advocates as Professor Stivors, Colonel Eylar, and others made such a strong stand for justice that justice prevailed, and our friend Beck, in spite of his declared and uncompromising unbelief, wields the baton of the schoolmaster. This shows what splendid material we hav in this field for the future work of Liberalism.

Professor Stivors is one of our ablest men. He is principal of the high school at West Union and ranks as one of the best teachers in the state. The church people can say nothing against his ability, and dare not make the issue with him on the question of Freethought. The professor is ready to face the music every time. He is perfectly fearless, and it is refreshing to find one who is so sincere and frank. It is the same with Colonel Eylar. He has no concealments. His Infidelity is a part of his manhood, and he can't keep it to himself. He was born so, and nature will out. I quite enjoyed the thorough naturalness of the man. He couldn't believe in the supernatural if he should try. He wasn't built that way.

Mr. and Mrs. Newton Vance, of Wrightsville, are also Liberals of the generous and inspiring order. They work together, and Freethought is to them the brightest gospel. They hav a son, who has been stricken with paralysis, and is confined to his bed. However, his mind is eager, and every week THE TRUTH SEEKER is read to him from beginning to end, and he has the keenest interest in regard to intellectual affairs. At the home of the Vances is the big orchard that we are to hav the meeting in next summer, and I anticipate a grand rally of our Ohio and Kentucky friends where the golden fruits shall welcome.

Dr. Beamer, of Cynthiana, Ky., was present also, and it was a pleasure to meet so genial a gentleman, who came from such a distance to enjoy fraternal associations. Where the doctor resides the community in general is orthodox, and the Liberal has a somewhat lonely path to go. Still the light is breaking and our Southern friends find that their forces are multiplying. The doctor is heart and soul in the Freethought movement. He has been a careful student of its principles and defender of its platform. I was pleased also to meet Benjamin Black, who, amid the silence of nature, has been a student of its sublime reality. A farmer and a hard-working man, on to seventy years of age now, he is reckoned one of the best geologists in the state. He has been a patient observer. He has also written a book on the origin of ideas, the Bible Jesus, etc., which is exceedingly interesting.

It will thus be seen that I had happy entertainment for my closing work. John J. Lockhart and family, John Baird and wife, Samuel Nesbit, S. E. Nesbit, Curtis Roush, F. M. Piatt, J. B. Thompson, James Gash, Gilbert Gash, Smith Grimes, Jacob Piatt, J. W. Anderson, J. Marlatt, Joe Trotter, Hainor Groner, G. A. Crawford, L. Bilue, K. Morris, and others contributed to the cheer and success of the meeting. Such a vigorous campaign was quite exhilarating, and made my homeward journey rich with hope.

Plunging into the mighty smoke of Cincinnati, I really thought I was in hades until I saw the pleasant face of my friend, Edgar C. Beall, and then I knew I was all right. No devils need apply. The "Brain" was ahead of the "Bible." Philosophy and poetry triumphed, and two sparkling hours flew by; and then, in the luxurious sleeper, amid a world of dreams, onward to sunny morn and noon and glowing evening sky I whirled, and once more, after a seven months' trip, I again saw the glorious Hudson heaving with its thousand jewels beneath the glittering moon. The wondrous city stretched before me with its million lights, and as my thoughts swayed with the rhythm of the majestic stream, it appeared like the ideal city of man's ardent desire, where humanity

Shall be good and great and joyous, and beautiful and free.

Memory and hope blend with shining joy; I cannot forget the many friends I hav met whose life is radiant with the spirit of liberty and progress. I hav realized more than ever the nobility of this world and the grandeur of what will be. How wor hy life becomes when it blends with universal truth. It may come and go like the waves of the sea, and death may sometime be a relief from the infinit struggle, and the unattainable may smite the soul with a bitter pain—yet to know that there are joy and glory and virtue and love in the universe of which we are a part; that there are heroism, devotion, purity, and generosity in man and woman; that in aspiration, at least, we touch the highest conceivable excellence—to realize this givs sweetness to every toil, and makes the very brevity of our work sublime. Better a splendid failure than poor success. Better effort, disappointment, disaster, and defeat than that we should accept anything less than what our manhood demands—than that we should surrender one particle of the bright ideal of truth and beauty. The future is ours, immeasurable in its possibilities. To feel that we hav done something to unfold these vast possibilities; that we hav made one ray to flash, one flower to bloom, that life is better, happier, more fruitful because we did our task even in tears and darkness—this will make the silence of the grave more beautiful to us than all the golden heavens of theology. It is not what the future givs to us, but what we giv to the future, that constitutes the glory of our work.

I think there is a nobler companionship among Liberals to-day than ever before. I look forward to the Congress in November for a great advance in the direction of unity. I believe we shall hav an impulse, an enthusiasm, and combination of forces new and powerful. There can be no more favorable place than the Empire City, with its grand cosmopolitan life, for larger plans and wider action. I hope that special efforts will be made by friends to come to this Congress. Almost everybody sometime wants to visit New York. Now is the occasion for Liberals to do this—to hear our speakers, and help by their presence the successful presentation of our cause and at the same time enjoy the treasures of this brilliant metropolis, so varied and attractiv, a world of marvelous progress. There can be no better field to gather inspirations for a great work. There will be a galaxy of representativ speakers, and the Freethought movement will be nobly interpreted. Mr. L. K. Washburn, of New England and the Boston Investigator, will be present; also John E. Remsburg, of Kansas; J. H. Burnham, of Michigan; E. A. Stevens, of Chicago; C. B. Reynolds, and Mrs. Reynolds, of New York; T. B. Wakeman, Helen H. Gardener, Charles Watts, etc. As soon as it is certainly known upon whom we can depend besides these, the program will be published. So far as oratory is concerned, we shall not lack. We want a representativ audience of a thousand from all parts of the country to listen to these important addresses. The prospects are bright for an eventful gathering—for good fellowship, harmonious counsel, and invigorating speech.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

New York, Oct. 9, 1886.

Canadian Notes.

Last month was notable for an unusual number of conventions held in Toronto and other parts of Canada.

First, of course, comes the Canadian Freethought convention, of which the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER hav already had a brief account. Then we hav had a convention of dentists; another of photographers; now one of the American Health Association; also the convention of Canadian undertakers, who hav joined his holiness the pope and the Rev. Dr. Potts in denouncing the sacrilegious idea of cremation.

Then we hav had the convention of the Canadian Temperance Alliance, some of the members of which were more intemperate in their language than the people they are trying to reach are in their appetites.

And last, though perhaps not least, were the two great religious conventions, that of the Provincial Anglican synod, held in Montreal, and the quadrennial convention of Canadian Methodists in Toronto. The movements of both these bodies are fraught with meaning to the Secularists and Liberals of this priest-ridden country. At both meetings the notes of alarm were sounded. The spread of Agnosticism and Infidelity was mournfully taken note of, and measures passed calculated to stem the rising tide.

At both meetings resolutions were passed in favor of the unity of all Christian sects and creeds, those passed at the Anglican synod in Montreal including even the Roman Catholic church.

It is not probable, considering the obstacles in the way, such as the doctrins of papal infallibility, apostolic succession, etc., that this idea of Christian unity will ever amount to much; but when the common enemy even talk of uniting, Freethinkers, and Liberals generally who are observant of the signs of the times, will understand why they wish to unite, and should act accordingly.

I don't wish to be considered an alarmist. The world of to-day—that is, the world of intellect—has passed through its age of credulity, and is now in the noonday of an age of inquiry, with the age of reason close at hand, and there is little cause to fear that secular or political power will ever again fall into the hands of the synods, sessions, or popes of superstition; yet, knowing the blighting influence which they hav exercised in the past, and what they would do again if they had the power, and knowing also how a combination of untoward circumstances might indefinitly postpone the day of universal mental freedom which all true Secularists are hoping and working for, it becomes us—particularly in Canada, where the forces of superstition never were stronger—to waive all minor differences of opinion and methods of procedure, and to form a union throughout all Canada for mutual defense and support.

The necessity for such a union was never more urgent than at present. From nearly every pulpit in the country come insulting references to and wilful misrepresentations of Secular principles, while the alleged religious press teems with calumny and abuse.

I hav before me two of these religious papers; one is the Irish Canadian, the Roman Catholic "organ" in and around Toronto, and the other the Dominion Churchman, the organ of the Church of England in Canada.

In the former is published a letter from the notorious Rev. Father Lambert (copied from the Brooklyn Examiner), being a reply to an invitation sent him by Mr. Reynolds to attend the late New York Freethought Convention, in which he givs a malicious rehash of some of the stereotyped lies of orthodoxy, particularly the lie which makes Freethought responsible for the excesses of the French Revolution—a lie which has been a thousand times refuted, but which, after the wear and tear of a hundred years, still comes up a trump card every time.

In the latter is an article entitled, "Fruit from the Tree of Secular Knowledge," in which the writer, speaking of the disgrace which has lately fallen upon Sir Charles Dilke, tries to make it appear that the social and moral ruin here involved is the direct outcome of Secular teaching, and "that the divorce of religion from education is a device of the devil, and that the coarsest immorality finds no restraint in Secular education," etc.

This is another reason why the Secularists of Canada should unite. Let us, then, organize to work in unity with the American Secular Union, and with the object of starting, as soon as possible, a Canadian Freethought journal wherein the deviltry of such statements as these could be exposed, and where for one very doubtful Oliver, as in the case of Sir Charles Dilke above quoted, we could giv them a thousand Rolands among the English aristocracy and in their own ranks.

In reply to several communications from friends in the country, some of whom hav expressed a desire to join such an organization as above suggested, I may say that the central committee will, in accordance with resolutions passed at the late Secular convention in Toronto, frame an appeal setting forth the aims and objects of the proposed union, a copy of which they will receive as soon as it is ready for circulation.

Our old friend, Burnham, left us some two weeks ago, after having delivered three of the most scientific and instructiv lectures we hav ever had in this city. His last one, entitled, "Fictitious and Intrinsic Values," is a gem, and worth going a long way to hear.

We hope to be able to hav him with us again before the season closes. In the mean time we are trying to paddle our own canoe for a few weeks with local talent. KANUCK.

Toronto, Oct. 9, 1886.

Away Out West.

For scenery that will wear, giv me my Minnesota. There is a lofty look about the Rockies very inspiring, but for beauty of outline and picturesqueness the four-hundred-feet bluffs around the shores of Lake Pepin surpass all I hav seen here.

Yet, it must be confessed that Montana is a wonderland. Butte City is the richest mining-camp in the world. In 1864 (twelve years ago) there was not one house here. Now there is a city of nearly twenty-five thousand, elegant buildings, electric lights, and the whirr and buzz of a young Chicago. It is situated in Silver Bow county. It is built on silver hills, intermixed with gold and copper. To get these metals involves immense labor. Silver bars by the wagon-load pass by me to the station. Millions of dollars' worth of copper, silver, and gold are shipped every year. Indeed, a single mine sends away millions every year. All around us are scattered mining-shafts, on the mountain side, in the vales. Day and night the fires of the smelters are going. The air is thick with smoke, carbonic acid gas, and the fumes of copper, and arsenic, too. It is not surprising that the ladies generally hav a bleached look in their complexions.

One mine was sold for $3,000,000 which was purchased by the discoverer for a bob-tailed sorrel horse.

I could fill a dozen pages with interesting facts of mining history—yea, verily, a whole TRUTH SEEKER full for a month. You hav not the space to print nor I the time to write what I hav seen and heard since I came to Butte. This is not so large a story as John tells in the last verse of his gospel.

Here is this city, built among the mountains, born in a day, so to speak, in obedience to man's unslaked thirst for gold and silver. Is the love of money the root of evil? Here, then, are thousands of root-diggers. This city throbs with life begotten of this love. The mass of the population hav but two gods left, whom they faithfully worship—silver and superstition. Yet I was cordially received by good congregations. Dr. O. B. Whitford has never quailed in presence of the church power of Montana. He has suffered persecution for his freedom of speech. A late form is from the Masonic brethren, who ought to hav stood by him in his battle for intellectual freedom. But that beneficent order is infested by Christian bigots, who insist that liberty and Freemasonry are incompatible. The doctor has prepared a reply to the charges preferred against him. He has turned their own weapons against themselvs. His arguments will be read with the deepest interest by all classes, and especially by Masons. His masterly brochure will be read around the wide world.

At this point in my letter I moved seventy miles south to Dillon, where I am announced for three lectures. In Butte I was enjoying the hospitalities of Mr. and Mrs. E. N. Dunckle. Mr. Dunckle is young in Liberalism and full of energy. I am greatly indebted to him and his kind and cultured wife for a highly enjoyable visit of several days. Mrs. Dunckle is a member of the church, but she was never superstitious or bigoted. I judge that, as she becomes acquainted with Liberalism, she likes it better than the old faiths. She is an excellent artist. With this letter I send you Mr. Dunckle's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER one year.

Mrs. Dr. Whitford is in hearty accord with her husband in his Freethought principles, albeit she is far more amiable in expressing her views, but as decided. When the church charges that our teachings render woman less refined, less womanly, I need only point to many such as she for a refutation.

The lectures by Brother Putnam and myself hav stirred the church. Since the announcements of our meetings the past two weeks we hav had some opposition meetings. A Mr. John B. Knight last Sunday evening gave an address on "Ingersollism Exposed." The Daily Miner reports him as saying: "Instead of the various crimes laid to the door of Christianity they should be put on the shoulders of Freethinkers, who, instead of building up the moral character of the people, were every ready to tear it down." The Daily Miner further stated that "he mentioned the Communists of Paris, the Anarchists of Chicago, who were all, without one exception, members of the Freethought party, and ready at the command of their leaders to commit any crime which their depraved moral nature gave them the courage to perform. The leaders were ever ready to talk of the moral elevation of the people, but had miserably failed in every attempt to put it into practice."

It is difficult to determin which is greater in the Christian kingdom, the ignorance of such a speaker or the credulity of the dupes who believed him. They dare not risk their cause in public debate. We hav challenged them to make good their claims to all the virtue in the world. We hav offered them the free use of our platform to oppose our principles and advocate their own. The preachers are as dumb as the tombstones in a "Christian" graveyard, else go and hire another hall for their one-sided Christian talk.

My old opponent, Rev. Jacob Ditzler, D.D., gave an address on the previous Sunday evening. He promised to meet me in debate in Butte. I hope we can hav the debate. Dr. Whitford says the Opera House will not hold the people who will want to hear it.

Mr. Bliven, of Dillon, invited me to his luxurious home. He and his excellent wife are making the life of the writer as full of joy as he can hold. I will hav more to say in my next. I fear I am trespassing on your columns, so I must reserve my criticism of the Catholic priest's sermon on the foundations of the church. We hav agitated our Christian friends.

As the preachers say, One word more and I am done. Our activ missionary, Brother Putnam, has done a grand work wherever he has gone through this glorious Western land. He is the right man in the right place. The Secular Congress will be wise to reëlect him. W. F. JAMIESON.

Butte, M. T.

Pennsylvania Secular Union.

The officers of this association and delegates from local societies met at Maltby Hall, 76 Fifth avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa., at 10 A.M., on Sunday, Sept. 19, E.M. 286. The meeting was called to order by President Seymour, who stated the aims and objects of the organization, and made an appeal for moral encouragement and substantial aid in carrying on the propaganda.

The secretary stated that the time for regular election of officers had arrived, whereupon an election was held. The following is the list of officers as elected: President, Prof. Wm. Seymour, Philadelphia; vice-presidents, Geo. Thorn, Clearfield, Pa.; F. A. Pierce, Pittsburgh, Pa.; J. W. Shaw, Philadelphia, Pa.; secretary, Henry Hoover, Pittsburgh, Pa.; treasurer, Roman Staley, Pittsburgh, Pa. Executiv Committee, Roman Staley, Pittsburgh, Pa.; George Starkey, Scranton, Pa.; W. E. Baker, Tarentune, Pa.; George Thorn, Clearfield, Pa.; A. Cuthbert, Butler, Pa. Finance Committee, G. W. Baldwin, Linesville, Pa.; Simeon Nixon, Butler, Pa.; Frank Bacon, Pittsburgh, Pa.; D. M. Miller, Etna.

At 3 P.M. the meeting was called to order by Mr. Roman Staley, and Secretary Hoover made a short address on "Secular Work."

Professor Seymour spoke at length upon the theme, "What does Secularism Offer in the Place of Christianity?"

The address was a masterly one, and gave universal satisfaction, as the applause of two hundred persons present testified. He was followed by Mr. Jas. E. Emerson, of Beaver Falls, Pa., who took for his subject, "Why I Left the Church." Mr. Emerson seemed to hav lost none of his old-time vigor, and did not fail to amuse and instruct his audience.

The Convention, although not as largely attended as could hav been desired, was permeated with an enthusiasm that augurs well for the future usefulness of the organization.

The president and secretary, Messrs. Seymour and Hoover, desire engagements to lecture in all parts of the state. The president's address is "Prof. Wm. Seymour, 1610 S. 13th street, Philadelphia, Pa.," and that of the secretary is "Harry Hoover, 86 Diamond street, Pittsburgh, Pa."

Watts and the Grand Rapids Ministers.

Mr. Watts's recent lectures in Grand Rapids appear to hav created quite an excitement among the clergy of the town. While the ministers attended his lectures, none of them would cross swords with him upon the platform. The Rev. Mr. Brooks, however, preached a special sermon from his pulpit aimed directly at Mr. Watts. This sermon was reported in the local paper. On reading it, Mr. Watts at once sent the reverend gentleman the following "open letter" through the press:

TO THE REV. E. H. BROOKS, Rev. Sir: I hav read in the Telegram-Herald the report of your sermon, entitled, "After the Infidel has Spoken—What Then?" given in your church yesterday morning. I discover therein so many indications on your part of misapprehensions and misrepresentations (unintentional, no doubt) that I hereby respectfully invite you to a public discussion upon the issues raised in your sermon. These appear to me to be, (1) the origin and nature of the Christian religion, (2) the morality and value of the Bible, (3) the truth and utility of Secularism or "Infidelity," as you term it. I am prepared to affirm that Christianity is of human origin and inadequate to meet the present needs of mankind; that the Bible is nothing more than a human production and defectiv as a moral guide, and that Secularism is superior to Christianity as a practical guide in every day life.

My object in thus inviting you to a calm and gentlemanly debate is to hav an opportunity to correct the many errors contained in your sermon, to allow the public to hav an opportunity of knowing the facts, with reference to the points at issue, and to vindicate Secular philosophy from the misrepresentations with which you hav surrounded it. I trust you will not hesitate to endeavor to prove in open discussion the extraordinary assertion you made before your congregation. If you think you hav truth upon your side you should hav no fear as to the result of any honest investigation. Yours with a desire to arrive at the truth,

CHARLES WATTS,
First Vice-President American Secular Union.

P.S.—This invitation is open to any one or for all of the Christian ministers of Grand Rapids. Any reply sent to the papers openly or to Mr. D. A. Blodgett, will reach me, and shall hav my immediate attention. C. W.

The subjoined is the Rev. Mr. Brooks's reply:

TO MR. CHARLES WATTS, Dear Sir: Your open letter, inviting me to debate with you, calls for at least a brief reply. It greatly surprises and amuses me to think that one of England's champions of "Secularism" should take any notice whatever of an obscure Baptist minister on the West Side of Grand Rapids. If it were in my power to act successfully the part of a controversialist, my views of such a method of arriving at the truth would prevent me from engaging in the discussion. Among other reasons for not taking this course, one appears in the words of Dr. Isaac Watts, of worldwide renown for scholarship and Christian piety, who said that "disputation carries away the mind from that calm and sedate temper which is so necessary to contemplate truth." From the frequent assertions of unbelief, as well as from your own, I was led without the spirit of controversy to address the young and others of my charge on those propositions which I believe will stand to the end of time. Your eloquence pleased me and your gifts appear worthy of a better cause than you espouse. May the time come when you and all other opposers of Christianity will be converted to the Lord Jesus Christ is my sincere prayer. "Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread and your labor for that which satisfies not?" "Come unto me and I will giv you rest." In the kindest feeling, I deem it best to decline your invitation. Respectfully yours,

E. H. BROOKS.

Subsequently, at a meeting of the Pastors' Union, it was unanimously voted to take no notice of Mr. Watts's lectures, and not to appear in debate with him. Brave ministers! heroic defenders of the gospel! paid to preach week after week that which they are incapable of defending in open debate! Truly, orthodoxy is a religion of blind faith and not of reasonable examination.

A Suggestion for Mr. Reynolds.

The apocryphal 1 and 2 Esdras are properly 3 and 4 Esdras.

The Douay (Catholic) Bible has 1 and 2 Esdras, which are the Protestants' Ezra and Nehemiah.

The quotation you make is properly from 4 Esdras, xiv, 21, 22, which is not in the Catholic canon.

See particulars in "Revelations of Antichrist," chap. xvi, "Old Testament Apocrypha." ANTIC.

Let Both Sides Be Heard.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Please say to your readers, and to the Liberals of the United States, that the press dispatches in regard to the arrest of E. C. Walker and Lillian Harman were grossly if not maliciously false in many important particulars, and that all who care to know the real facts in the case can get them by addressing,

A Good Man Nominated in Massachusetts.

MR. EDITOR: On returning from the benighted Down East, whose darkness no ray from THE TRUTH SEEKER seems to hav yet penetrated, I rejoice to find one of the noblest champions of taxing churches and enfranchising Atheists and Agnostics nominated for governor of Massachusetts. His ability is universally honored, as is his disinterestedness, and his political career has been equally remarkable for independence and success. No one is so worthy to take the place once filled by his father, our first Governor Andrew. F. M. HOLLAND.

Curiosity Satisfied.

WALACH CITY, IDAHO TER., Sept. 7, 1886.

MR. EDITOR, Dear Sir: On page 514 of THE TRUTH SEEKER for Aug. 14, 1886, is an article, "Facts About the New Testament."

1. Will Mr. John Peck please account for the presence of these "gospels?" Telling us that "they exist" is not accounting for them, neither is telling us that "men were superstitious in those days." There hav been many conflicting accounts of the great Chicago fire; still, it was a fire all the same and made considerable smoke.

There were many conflicting accounts of Blaine's defeat, yet he was defeated. What we want as Freethinkers is a cause for this peculiar craze which took possession of the people at that time.

2. Will he please construct an argument to overthrow Esop's fables and Mother Goose's nursery rhymes and stories?

3. It would also be well to construct an argument to overthrow ancient mythology and astrology.

4. Please explain why these Christians are printing the Bible, which "rests upon forgeries, frauds, and lies," at the rate of five million copies a year, and in over two hundred and fifty different languages; and that work grown up in this, the most enlightened century in the world's existence, and by the two nations that more than all others influence the world's progress.

If there was a little superstition eighteen hundred years ago, there must be a great deal more now, for there are more Bibles now than ever before, and as much preaching as ever before. Answers to the above will oblige

A TRUTH SEEKER.

AN OPEN LETTER TO "A TRUTH SEEKER."

My Dear Sir: You hav taken a deal of pains to let us know from your far-off Western home the size of the hat you wear.

It is interesting sometimes, when a man is half drunk and wants to inveigh against the temperance reform, to hear him tell what a good temperance man he is.

You are not only a "truth seeker," but a "Freethinker," yet you seem to be very much exercised when the veracity and authenticity of "these gospels" are assailed.

There are thousands of just such Freethinkers in the Catholic church—free to think as ecclesiastics may direct; free to think that the fall and the plan of redemption, the immaculate conception, the resurrection, the ascension, and all the miracles of the New Testament rest upon the bed-rock of truth, just as much as the demonstrations of Euclid. But such "Freethinkers" are never free to doubt.

Your kind of freedom allows you to believe that a man may be brought to life after he has been dead four days and "stinketh," and that a man may hav a devil in him like the man mentioned in the book of Mark—so powerful that no chains could bind him.

Now, a genuin "Freethinker" and an earnest truth seeker would no more be engaged in defending such nonsense than he would be in defending the stories in Baron Munchausen.

A "Freethinker" will never be imposed upon by the impossible. He will free himself from the supernatural and the miraculous at a single bound.

Who clothed you with the power to voice the wants not only of "Freethinkers" like Putnam, Palmer, and Ingersoll, but of all the "Freethinkers" in the world? "What we want as Freethinkers" is more thoroughly honest men who will not turn "pig or puppy" as the occasion may require.

A "Freethinker" and a "truth seeker" trying to uphold any system of supernatural religion renders himself an object of contempt and ridicule.

I knew a minister who could not talk ten minutes without railing against Infidels and Infidel literature, and all the time taking THE TRUTH SEEKER on the sly. You would be more consistently engaged if passing the contribution-box in his church than trying to pass yourself off as a Freethinker and a truth seeker.

You ask me to "account for the presence of these gospels." Now, I will play Yankee and ask you to account for the "Book of Mormon." "There hav been many conflicting accounts" of it, but here it is, and there is no "smoke" about it either.

"The Book of Mormon" originated in my own county, and I hav been to "Mormon Hill," where "these [Mormon] gospels" were dug up, and I hav in my possession the affidavits of more than a dozen men who, upon their solemn oaths, swore that they had "seen and hefted" the original plates from which the Book of Mormon was taken. Now, if you will giv as good a showing for the truth and verity of "these gospels" of the New Testament, you may "sleep on the fore side."

It is a little over fifty years since the "Book of Mormon" was published, and there are more Mormons to-day than there were Christians fifty years after the time that Christ began to preach, according to the account.

Now, if you will "giv a cause for the peculiar craze" that took possession "of the Mormons" and the "people" of Ontario county "at that time," I will agree to giv the cause of the craze that originated "these gospels."

Moreover, there was a "peculiar craze" that originated the Koran and more than a dozen other so-called sacred books. No end to these "peculiar crazes."

What two nations more than all others influence the world's progress has not yet been decided. England, France, Germany, and the United States might each claim that it was doing the most to "influence the world's progress."

But it should be borne in mind that the influence which affects "the world's progress" may retard as well as accelerate. It would require no great effort to show that "these gospels" which you are so much concerned about retarded "the world's progress" for more than a thousand years, and are retarding it to-day.

The idea which you doubtless wish to convey is that "these two nations," whichever they may be, owe their "progress" to the Christian religion. I affirm that they owe their "progress" to Infidelity. For in the most progressiv nations will be found the most Infidelity.

If Christianity has the power of starting nations on the high-road to "progress," how does it happen that Germany, which has the grandest institutions of learning of any nation on the globe, stands so far above Spain, Portugal, and Russia? There are no people more loose in regard to Christian requirements than the Germans, while these other nations just mentioned are intensely Christian. Germany does more brain work, and more to influence the "world's progress," than the other three nations combined.

If Christianity is the great factor in a nation's progress, why did Europe stand still for more than ten centuries while it was under the strict control of Christian rulers?

Was the Inquisition an engin of progress? It was certainly a Christian institution. Did it add to the world's progress to oppose the art of printing, and exercise a censorship over all books printed? Christianity did this for more than a hundred years. Indeed, it has not left off the nefarious business yet. The Christian bull-dog, Comstock, is still its paid agent.

Did it help on the world's progress to contend for a flat earth, and oppose the Copernican theory, and imprison Galileo and burn Bruno? Did the Christian wars in which millions of human lives were sacrificed "influence the world's progress" for good? Was it a happy period in the world's history when not one person in twenty in Europe could either read or write? when thousands were being put to death for the unmeaning crime of witchcraft? when tens of thousands were put to the rack and otherwise tortured for opinion's sake? That was the proudest period in the history of Christianity, for it had everything its own way.

No, no; it will not do to attribute a nation's progress to the influence of Christianity any more than to blue umbrellas.

Colonel Ingersoll said that "the earth was better fitted for fish culture than man culture." There is only a narrow belt which produces first-class men. On each side of this belt the soil, climate, and environments are such as to forbid the production of men and women who will be much interested in "the world's progress."

Where the climate is sultry, and the soil, without much cultivation, will yield nearly enough to satisfy man's natural wants, there is no system of religion which can make the people thoroughly enterprising. On the other hand, where the climate is rigorous and soil steril, and all the time is required to obtain even the necessities of life, not all the "gospels" ever written can lash the people to keep pace with those situated between these extremes.

To attribute these differences to any system of religion would be just as silly as to attribute them to the "presence" or absence of blue umbrellas.

You say there are five millions of Bibles printed every year, and you adduce this fact as evidence that the Bible does not rest upon "forgeries, frauds, and lies." I suppose if there were six millions or ten millions of Bibles printed, instead of five millions, there would remain not a doubt in regard to the matter.

If this is a cogent argument, then the truth of the Mormon religion will depend on the number of copies of the "Book of Mormon" which they hav printed. Of course, it must follow that the truth of any system of religion will depend upon the number of sacred books (or Bibles) which its followers may publish.

Your last paragraph is to the effect that if the Christian religion originated in superstition, there must be a great deal more now, because there are a great many more Bibles printed, and much more preaching. Therefore the last vestige of superstition can be eliminated from any system of religion if the adherents of that religion only publish so-called sacred books enough, and send out a sufficient number of ministers.

You ask me to construct an argument to overthrow "Mother Goose's Nursery Rhymes and Stories."

I hav wrestled with some abstruse questions in astronomy in years gone by, but this is too deep for me—it makes me feel my littleness. The part is too heavy, I throw up the sponge—"Enough, take him off!"

There are two classes of men which I heartily despise. One is a class of men who hav outgrown the superstition of the Christian religion, and still claim to be Christian. The other is a class who are still entangled in the meshes of superstition, and make a pretense of being Liberal.

I hav seen letters and articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal papers signed "Liberal," or "Freethinker," or "Truth Seeker," which betrayed a bigotry and superstition befitting the lowest Catholic.

I hav no respect for the man who has "Freethinker" inscribed on his banner, and enters the arena in defense of the Christian superstition.

> God knows I'm not the man I should be,
> Nor even yet the man I could be,
> But still I rather ten times would be
> An Atheist clean
> Than under gospel colors hid be,
> Just for a screen.

Such men are hidebound and troubled with a shrinkage of the heart, and liable to die of "dry rot." They want bleeding and roweling and turning out in the green pastures of Freethought.

My advice to you is to read Paine and Waite and Ingersoll and other Freethought writers, and post up. Put away your bigotry and superstition, subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and never pretend to be what you are not.

JOHN PECK.

Editorial Rights and Duties.

If I understand the vocation of an editor who conducts a public journal in a free country such as ours, it is like that of the ancient watchman on the walls of fortified cities whose responsible office was to observe the movements of the besieging army without, and notify those within of the signs of approaching danger. A watchman owed no duties to those without; all his obligations of honor and duty were to those within the walls who had intrusted their interests, for the time being, to his safe-keeping.

The press in this country, political and otherwise, professes to be devoted, generally and specifically, to the public good, in one or other of its various forms. This being the ruling motiv, it was in former times deservedly regarded as the safeguard of the people's rights and interests, sounding the alarm whenever there was any appearance of encroachment upon them. The framers of the government, knowing that it was the nature of power and wealth to trample upon the weak, provided that there should be frequent elections of the law-making functionaries so that any attempts upon the people's interests could be nipped in the bud.

But in our day the besieging enemy has bribed the watchmen on the walls, and they hav opened the gates and allowed him to enter in. In other words, the press of the country, like almost every other power, has become insane with the love of money, and has sold out to the capitalist; and we are eye-witnesses to the humiliating fact that in a government founded by and for the people, the masses who, by their labor, create all the wealth, are becoming poorer, and the rich richer. As a general rule, with some noble exceptions, the press, like the lawyers as a class, has become a mere strumpet, selling its favors to rich corporations and receiving money in return. Not only influential papers in the great centers of population are subsidized to capital, but the county papers, with their editors, hav been bought up, so that the people who used to look to them for knowledge see no discussions of the questions so deeply affecting their interests, and are misled at the polls by party politicians.

The distinction of the radical, or Freethought, press is that, not being limited by geographical lines, and not belonging to the money power, it takes the highest moral ground, and discusses all subjects that concern the welfare of humanity, not only in this country, but the world over, advocating truth, justice, and right, at all times, under all circumstances, and at all hazards. As the two requisits of a man who occupied the responsible position of a watchman on the walls of a beleaguered city were, first, that he hav good eyesight to see, and secondly, that he hav fidelity of character, so the editor of a Freethought journal should be a man who takes a large view of things; and who, impartially studying the causes, foresees the effects of them. Mounted on the walls, of course, he is expected to see farther than those who are inside, and whose vision must necessarily be limited. Besides the qualification of intelligence and foresight, such an editor must hav a heart loyal to the cause he professes to advocate. He must not be turned aside from the pursuit of his object, or be goaded into a compromise of the truth at any crisis, by short-sighted friends who criticise his judgments. Such friends hav a right to criticise, and he is glad of any light they can shed on the path of his duty. But if he is fit for the place, he must go, after all, by his own convictions, or resign it to the occupancy of some one else. In times of panic, when men's minds are generally confused, and when he is liable to be misunderstood, even by his friends and co-laborers, he must still remain firm. And his only consolation in such circumstances is the mens conscia recti—a mind conscious of rectitude—and the strong faith that the truth will triumph in the end. The magnetic needle which points to the north is not the emblem of editorial fidelity to the cause of humanity in the great struggle now going on against superstition in the church and injustice in the state; for in certain localities it varies. The Polar star is the true emblem. It keeps its place in the heavens, and shines brightly at night, although the intervening clouds of a storm may eclipse it for a time. Free thought on all subjects of human interest whatever, and the free expression of those thoughts by lips and pen, are the foundation principles of the Radical movement, which must be preserved intact, and constantly enforced in the columns of its press. In times of excitement and doubt every subscriber ought to feel, when he opens his paper, that he is about to scan the words of a capable and honest man, who cannot be tempted to yield one jot or tittle of his principles to the clamors of the multitude. Such was the confidence which the readers had in the Boston Liberator and the New York Tribune forty years ago, when Garrison conducted the one and Horace Greeley the other. And such ought to be the confidence which the readers of our Freethought journals repose in the ability, courage, and fidelity of the men who conduct them.

This train of thought was suggested to my mind by Mr. Ray's letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of a late date, expressing fear that the editor might be tending in his influence toward "Anarchy"—a term which, in its etymology and in the common comprehension, means no government, but every man being a law into himself and doing what he pleased. The fear is based upon the fact that THE TRUTH SEEKER, while vigorously opposing the Anarchy notion itself, has defended the right of the wildest Anarchist to express his opinions. This, as an advocate of free speech, it was bound by its principles to do. There can be no compromise between the two extremes of free speech and despotism.

I hav been for a long time, on principle, an advocate of woman suffrage; yet I hav no doubt that if the women voted it would not be a year before they would, under the influence of the clergy, attempt to put all Freethinkers in jail, and silence all our Radical papers. But because they would abuse their rights in doing so, is it for me to deny them their rights? We are not responsible for the use people make of the ballot, or free speech, but we are responsible, to the extent of our influence, for their being deprived of their rights.

The Anarchists hav a natural, constitutional, and legal right, in this country, to express their opinions, whatever they may be. Treason does not consist in having opinions hostil to the government and uttering them freely. The government itself, although so jealous of its authority, defines treason to be the overt act of levying war against the United States. Jeff Davis is as much a traitor in heart and speech as he ever was, but the government lays not a finger of restraint upon him, because it knows that treason consists, not in talk, or threats, or proposals for a revolution, but in acts.

All the Anarchists that hav got into trouble in this country, with a single exception, are foreigners. They don't understand the genius of our government; how that law is not here the decree of a king and aristocracy, but the expression of the will of the people; that the people hav the inherent and admitted right to alter, not only the laws, but the Constitution itself; and therefore, if any man or set of men hav a real grievance, it can be redressed peaceably by law, instead of by revolution. This method of reforming abuses by repealing old laws which allow them, and enacting new laws which forbid them, is a slow one, we must admit, trying to the patience of the aggrieved, and to their faith in humanity. It must begin by free discussion of the merits of the questions involved, a provokingly gradual enlightenment of a majority of the people, and an ultimate formal embodiment of their opinion and will in the form of law. We Americans think that this slow way of doing things is safer and vastly less expensiv on the whole than the revolutionary method resorted to by oppressed men in despotic governments which allow of no free speech. In our system free speech is not only a safety-valve to those who are aggrieved, allowing them to express their opinions and feelings to their heart's content, but it has this advantage, that it brings into comparison the views of different honest thinkers, and enables all hands to judge which view or policy is the best. The national Constitution owes its nearness to perfection to the debates which preceded its formation and adoption. And the same cause which the Constitution was made to serve—the public good—can be promoted during the changes which time makes only by the same means—free discussion. These Anarchists, crazed and expatriated by the oppressions of their nativ land, think their theory is correct, and they avail themselvs of our freedom of speech to expound it. The editor of a Radical paper, knowing that no one man knows everything, and prompted by a regard for the public good, advocates the right of these men to speak their mind. But he does not, therefore, indorse their sentiments. It is his duty, if he believes these opinions to be wrong, and, if reduced to action, to be dangerous to the public weal, to prove them to be so, as I think our editor has done. Free speech is an inestimable blessing; but if you deliberately take it you must take it, as you do all other advantages, with its drawbacks and disadvantages. It will not do when a man shocks you with the expression of his opinions to clap your hand on his mouth and forbid any further utterance. It is my astonishment and sorrow that some of our most earnest friends and coworkers do this, and by so doing forfeit their claim to be Freethinkers, and show their distrust in the potency and ultimate triumph of truth.

Cities are peculiarly exposed to panics of all kinds. I cannot giv in a short newspaper article all the reasons for my opinion, but I am convinced that the Anarchists of Chicago could never hav been convicted, on the evidence, of murder in the first degree, nor Herr Most, of New York, hav been sent to the penitentiary, by a court of justice in a rural district, where men's judgments are not heated and clouded by fear and prejudice, as they necessarily are in a city. The time will come, and that before long, when every true American will feel ashamed when he thinks how, in the two largest cities of the republic, justice, panic-stricken by free speech, dropped the emblematical even scales from her hand, tore off the bandage from her eyes, and ran pell-mell, as if the devil was after her.

I hav said that the mens conscia recti is the chief comfort an editor has, when, by keeping his eye steadfastly on the Polar star of his principles, and guiding his ship accordingly, he exposes himself to the criticism of some excellent, but timorous, passengers on board. But still he feels cheered by the approbation of others who are sailing with him, and hence I giv my opinion. I hav read every line which THE TRUTH SEEKER's editor has published, and hav never seen the least disposition in him to depart from the fundamental principles on which the paper was founded. As we can only hope for the world's redemption from the bondage of superstition and injustice by the agency of Freethought and free speech, exercised by free men, I admire the pertinacity of our editor in sticking to those principles through thick and thin. He is a young man, but carries a very level head. At least, so thinks

Anarchy and "The Truth Seeker."

The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, in the issue of Sept. 25, 1886, makes a masterly reply to John Ray on the right of free expression on all subjects. Where he says, "Some Freethinkers limit Freethought to the right to criticise theology, but say that social institutions must be left alone," he not only completely sustains his position, but opens the eyes of his purblind critic to the correctness of that position, that thought is not Freethought when confined to one thing.

Again, he says: "The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is neither an Anarchist, a Socialist, nor a Communist, but he has a sincere respect for the many able men and women who hold those social views, and is not quite so arrogant in his own conceit as to say that there is no good in any of their philosophies. The present times are decidedly out of joint socially, and perhaps in one of these systems, or in all, lies the remedy for the labor troubles. Let us study them and see, instead of hanging their advocates." So say we.

Though not identified with the Anarchists, nor claiming a belief in the doctrin, yet we claim the right to study it, and giv expression to our conclusions. Neither do we arrive at them from swallowing newspaper twaddle; for it has ever been the policy of the monopolistic press to make every reform advocated by labor appear extremely ridiculous or herald its encroachment on property rights, and if ridicule failed to awaken the monopolist to the fact that labor should be sat upon, the cry that labor wanted the earth never failed to bring out the blue-coats and militia, and then the under dog was tenderly petted with locust stroke and bayonet push into quiet submission. Of course, this is one way of convincing a man that he is wrong; but somehow or another the principle remains the same. So with the Chicago Anarchists. They may die, and perhaps will, at the hands of the law, but Anarchy livs on, and there is just where the absurdity of the whole thing presents itself. Why does the state kill the Anarchists to destroy Anarchy? This same blunder was made by the English government years ago. It executed some of the noblest of men to kill home rule for Ireland. In executing Robert Emmet it silenced the man, but the principle still livs, and is stronger today.

Thomas Paine, when he was a representativ in the French government, only by accident escaped with his life, because he would not vote for the execution of the monarch. He said, "I want to kill monarchy, not the monarch;" but he was a statesman who fought for human rights and lived for posterity. When an old coward saw the approaching trouble between England and the colonies, he remarked to Paine, if there was to be trouble he hoped it would not come in his day, to which Paine replied, "I should think you would say, 'Let it come in my day, that my children may hav peace.'"

Force gave birth to law, and it evinces all its mother's characteristics. When the strong invaded the weak, the latter conceived the idea that combined force was the only counteractant. Thus combined force was established and christened law; and ever since, Might against might makes all wrongs right, has been the motto of men.

Reciprocity must be the future bond of union that shall hold mankind together. This can only be by exercising the referendum, and then our laws will become more and more reciprocal, till force will disappear altogether. Laws as they are now sprung upon us by treacherous legislativ bodies, without the least premonition, prove to be curses instead of blessings. This talk may be full of Anarchy, perhaps it is; but, for the welfare of mankind, let it come. If prayer would be of any avail, we would say, "Let us pray that reciprocity will speedily and effectually supplant force;" but we know differently. Strife and struggle, sunshine and shadow, will long be with us before the bright morn of the millennium dawns upon us. RAY D. CHAPMAN.

Equal and Exact Justice Demanded.

It is not a little surprising that one who has read THE TRUTH SEEKER attentivly for the last six months could hav misapprehended its position in relation to Anarchy and the Anarchists. Such misconception must hav arisen not only from a failure to perceive, as stated in its last issue, the difference between "advocating an opinion and the right of others to hold that opinion," but in the teeth of a distinct disclaimer. It is not less surprising, too, that so many persons are to be found professing Liberal ideas who look with a certain degree of approbation, not to say of tenderness, upon the palpable manifestations of despotism in some recent judicial proceedings.

Herr Most, as every lawyer in the country knows, is serving out an illegal sentence, imposed by a magistrate who could publicly express his regret that he could not, while acting as judge, play the part of a legislator for the purpose of extending the term of his imprisonment.

When, in a case of life and death, the jury, in obedience to popular clamor, or to court public favor, in the rendition of its verdict sets law and justice and common sense at defiance; when the magistrate of inferior jurisdiction, for the same cause, and impelled by the same motivs, sends the unfortunate and the defenseless, or even the coarse and the repulsiv, to jail for some crime not known to the laws, or some offense beyond his jurisdiction, we are menaced by a danger far more formidable than the ravings of a few crazy fanatics, how publicly and noisily soever made.

If the government, under the guise of the administration of justice, tramples upon the right of the free discussion of political and social questions in the public assemblage and through the press, it has already started in a career of oppression under which liberty, if not civilization, must perish. That the danger in this direction is imminent the recent shocking utterances of the leading journals of the country in relation to this subject fully attest, and unless it is manfully and resolutely met we shall soon find ourselvs helpless in the grasp of a worse than medieval despotism.

The assemblies of Anarchists, Salvation Armies, revivalists, etc., should be protected rather than suppressed, so long as these people refrain from illegal acts. The right of free speech and of free public discussion, though sometimes exercised in an injudicious and intemperate manner, should be sedulously guarded. It acts as a safety-valve for the passions and the emotions, motivs and purposes are constantly brought to light and appear upon the surface, and society is thereby preserved from disorder through secret conspiracies and by overt acts, as the solid earth is said to be saved from chaos by seismic disturbances or occasional belchings from the volcano's top.

It was once said that the blood of the martyrs was the seed of the church. This was but an affirmation of the conviction, intuitiv in the mind of man, that bloodthirsty injustice must be in the end retroactiv. If the illegal and unjust verdict of the jury at Chicago is carried into effect, it will do more toward creating a sympathy for its victims and their cause than their impracticable utterances could hav achieved in a score of years. There is an innate sense of justice in the hearts of the "plain people" of this country which cannot be obliterated, and which will, if not borne down by the strong hand, rectify in due time the evils of the social state.

While I am permitted to read THE TRUTH SEEKER, I hope it will never be wanting in its advocacy of equal and exact justice toward all men. I shall hav no misgivings in that direction while it remains under its present management.

Fire.

The evening papers of this city last Friday contained accounts of a most disastrous fire at 33 Clinton Place, THE TRUTH SEEKER's loss being put down at $2,000. As many of our readers may hav seen these accounts, and formed the opinion that THE TRUTH SEEKER is ruined, we herewith state that our loss is comparativly light, and will not exceed $100. If thirty delinquents will remit at once, we shall be whole again.

The fire broke out about one o'clock Friday morning, the 8th inst., in the front window of a barber-shop in the basement. Fortunately, it was at once discovered by a passer-by, who summoned the fire patrol and city fire department, and the flame was extinguished after ruining the contents of the barber-shop and a shoe-shop in one part, breaking a section of the plate-glass window in our store front, and burning our awning. Excepting the awning, these damages are covered by the insurance on the building.

The juxtaposition of a fire and an Infidel journal proved too much for the editors of some of the dailies, and many were the sarcastic comments thereon, with sly allusions to a fire of a different nature further along in our career. But, so far as we can see, all the morals of this conflagration are on our side. The barber is a Christian, and the shoemaker is also. They are burnt out completely. THE TRUTH SEEKER escaped with but a trifling damage compared to theirs. We attribute this escape to the well-known fact that the Lord takes care of his own, and we hail it as a revelation from him that on he is on our side in our crusade against Christian iniquity and in our endeavors to make the world a little freer. At any rate, the Christian press is welcome to all the comfort it can obtain from the circumstances of Friday morning.

The Resting-Place of the Heathen.

Individual Christian hearts may become tender, but the combined heart of theology, the authoritativ heart, is not easily softened. This fact has led to a doctrinal squabble in the American "Board of Missions." This board is supported by the orthodox wing of the church, and its doctrins, therefore, are orthodox. The duties of the board heretofore hav been to send missionaries to the heathens with the cheering intelligence that all the heathens who hav previously lived and died are now in hell, and that all those now alive will, when they die, go to hell unless they first go to Christ. All mankind, say the board, are for the sin of Adam doomed to eternal punishment from which there is no salvation without believing in Christ; and the case of those who never heard of Christ in their lifetime, and therefore had no opportunity of believing in him, is as truly hopeless as if they had heard of him and refused to believe in him.

This doctrin has heretofore been vigorously taught by the missionaries to the heathen, and has proved so inexpressibly painful to the heathen that it has proved a barrier to the extension of the beneficent system of religion which teaches it. A few of the missionaries lately hav seen the cruelty of the doctrin, and asked the board for permission to soften their teachings by holding out a hope that the ancestors of the present heathen may possibly be in heaven. This permission the board has refused, and the missionaries will still be handicapped by the disagreeable doctrin of hell for all who never heard of Christ. The position of the orthodox party is thus defined by the Independent, a Congregational journal of some pretensions:

"Here comes a man who wants to preach the gospel to the heathen. He is all right in every respect, it is said, except in the firm belief that God is so good that at some time in the far-off future he will 'finally save all men.' 'Shall we send him to China?' we ask. 'Oh! yes,' is the answer, 'for he is a very good man, and perfectly sound in other respects.' Another man applies, who believes that God cannot punish a man who has never heard of the Bible or Christ or the way of salvation. 'Shall such a preacher be sent?' 'Yes; on the whole we will pass him.' Another offers his valuable services, saying, 'I agree with you in all things except in the doctrin of election.' 'What shall we do with such a man?' 'Let him go,' is the prompt reply. Another believes in a future probation for all men—heathen included. 'This is a hard case indeed; but,' it is said, 'we had better send him.' Another candidate says, 'No matter what a man believes, if his heart is right and he is truly good.' 'What shall we say about him?' 'Nothing. Let him go.' Another man, on being questioned, says, 'I indorse all your creeds; but I don't believe much in miracles.' He is a good scholar and appears to be an earnest Christian. But he doesn't believe the story of Jonah and the whale; neither does he credit, as truth, the statement that the sun actually stood still at the command of Joshua, or that there was real fire in the furnace into which Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego were cast; and there are other so-called miracles, he says, which he does not believe in. He ends by saying as a clincher that the fish story about Jonah and the whale settled the question with him and he can't go that miracle anyway. 'Well, now, shall we keep such a good man home?' 'No! No!' we will hear it said, somewhere. 'Send him to Japan. We don't want such a preacher here. He can't do much hurt there anyway.'

"Now, then, an amiable man comes who doesn't believe in the chemistry of the Bible. He doesn't believe in real hell fire, or brimstone, or any such nonsense. 'Never mind. Send him along. He can't help doing some good, somewhere—say in the South Sea Islands.'

"At last a zealous, outspoken man comes along, who thinks he has special gifts as a teacher, and would like to be sent to Africa. But the matter with him is that he doesn't believe in a personal devil, while many of the benighted Africans really do. 'And what in the world shall we do with such an erratic man?' The answer is: 'Oh! never mind what he believes and says about the devil. He is just the man for Africa. Send him along.'"

The above shows the kind of men the board does not want. Any man too kind-hearted to believe that God will not finally "save all men;" any man who even dreams that possibly the millions who lived and died before Christ are not in hell; any man who does not believe that God "elected" only a certain few to be saved; any man who thinks that dying sinners are given another chance; any man who repudiates sleight of hand as a spiritual weapon; any man who does not think there is a hell and a personal devil; in short, any minister in whom Christianity has not smothered every spark of humanity, hidden every gleam of common sense, removed every trace of feeling, and made as cold and callous as John Calvin, is not wanted, and will not be sent to teach the glorious beauties of Christianity to the heathen. Men are wanted who will teach the barbarians civilized doctrins. The perfect missionary will approach the dusky savage with these sentiments: "My dear savage, you are in danger of hell fire, and I desire to warn you to flee from the wrath to come. God, my gentle aborigine, is a God of war, and he has arranged a program as follows: All men are dead, morally, in Adam's sin; there is no escape from hell except through Christ's offices as a mediator; only a few men are elected, anyway, to be saved; good works are of no account; all your ancestors, never having heard of Christ, are suffering in hell; and you, my beloved barbarian, are already as good as damned unless you believe in this civilized religion and become as a little child in following the savior—which the same is myself, the representativ of Christ—and in supporting his ministers." That being good orthodox Christianity, will entitle the missionary believing it to be sent, expenses paid, house furnished and perquisits allowed, to Borroboola Gha, to liv on the fat of the land and come back once in a while to tell missionary stories to Sunday-schools and collect pennies from the children.

The fight over this matter is a warm one, and reminds us of Don Quixote's tilt with a windmill, except that in this struggle the windmill does most of the fighting. Who knows anything about where the dead are? What shade has walked the earth and told the living the state of affairs on the other side? Who possesses any evidence on the subject? And where did he get it? Upon this subject the wisest knows no more than the most ignorant, and an argument on the color of the hair of the man in the moon would hav as much evidence to sustain it as the one about whether those who never heard of Christ are or are not in hell. The fact that the existence of hell is an absurd idea ought to weigh something with the reverend disputants.

Jesuitical Interference in Belgium.

The "Congregation of the Inquisition" at Rome has sent to the Catholic judges of Belgium an order forbidding them to grant divorces when the suing parties are Catholics. All the judges in Belgium being Catholics, the order virtually prohibits a Catholic from obtaining a divorce. This decree is in pursuance of the settled policy of the church to maintain that marriage is a sacrament and not a civil contract, and that it is indissoluble except by death.

There is a divorce law in Belgium which has been in existence since 1803, but the church has not until now attempted to nullify it. The present order will revive, it is said, the strife between the Liberals and the church, and a fair trial of strength will be made.

To those who hold that Catholicism is not inimical to free government, the order of the Inquisition ought to be significant. That church holds that her people everywhere are subject to her control before that of the state. No matter what the laws are, she assumes that they are not applicable to her children when in conflict with her own laws. This is an arrogant position, and must be galling to the various states, but some of them submit to it tamely enough.

Another significant fact is that this order applies only to Belgium. The reason for this exclusivness is not far off. It is but a few months since a direct issue between Romanism and Secularism was made in Belgium over the school question. The Romanists won. The pope, therefore, feels that in that country, at least, he is strong enough to boldly enforce a policy that is well known, and held in abeyance in those countries only in which Catholicism is comparativly weak.

What the pope will feel sufficiently strong to attempt in this country within the next decade is an interesting problem. Statisticians can figure out the growth of Catholicism, and then guess.

A Fool and His Folly.

It is a singular fact that there are only two preachers in Brooklyn who are listened to each Sunday by any considerable number of people. The one is Beecher, the heretic; the other, Talmage, the orthodox clown. Beecher attracts by his advanced ideas and utter abandonment of nearly all Christian doctrins; Talmage, by his ridiculous adherence to puritan theology and his credulous superstition. Sunday before last, the latter, after declaiming against Ingersoll (quoted in these columns last week) recited the following catalog of punishment upon blasphemers:

"Yet God sometimes demonstrates his power. Two or three years ago, in the Adirondacks, I met the funeral procession of a man who had worked all Sunday in the field and boasted that he had cheated God out of one day at least. He challenged God and God accepted the challenge. Between Marsgate and Ramsgate, in England, there is a place where a young man was struck dead while swearing. A prisoner in Pittsburgh applied a terrible epithet to Jesus Christ, was struck down, and died after two days' fearful suffering. In Sullivan county are eight tombstones, all belonging to one family. In 1861 diphtheria raged in the neighborhood. A physician who was very successful in checking the disease became so confident as to defy God to produce a case he could not cure. In a few days afterward a little child of his fell sick with diphtheria and died. Another followed, and another, till all eight were dead. Last August a man flourished a knife toward heaven and dared God to come down, threatening to cut him if he did. That man himself was cut down, smoke poured from his mouth and nostrils, and he was dying for days, while nobody could go near him."

There is a verse somewhere in holy writ that fits Talmage. It reads something like this: "Though thou shouldst bray a fool in a mortar, yet will not his foolishness depart from him." Every one of his references is a known lie, yet he recounted these supposed exploits of the Lord as though they were actual facts. Talmage's mental caliber about equals that of Miss Frances Willard, who wrote asking him if he did not believe that the earthquake was sent to Charleston as punishment for its sins!

Faith-Cure.

The London, Can., Advertiser of the 4th inst. prints a story of a faith cure in that town which we expect will soon be reprinted all over the country, and triumphantly flung at Infidels with a request to know what they think of it. The story is that on June 8, 1885, Mrs. J. McKenzie, of London, Ont., was taken sick. A medical diagnosis pronounced the cause a cold upon the lungs. Since then she has, it is alleged, been confined to her bed. Recently she said to her husband that she believed she could be cured by faith. The idea, she said, was put into her head by almighty God. A crowd of Christian brethren were summoned, and prayer and supplication ensued, at the termination of which, the account goes, she took up her bed and walked, or words to that effect. Since then she has been rather stronger than Samson was before his dalliance with Delilah, and has cleaned house and gone to church with regularity.

This is a pretty story, and to men of the caliber of Talmage it will be a great comfort. But a correspondent who livs in London, and has known the parties intimately well for a number of years, writes that it is an advertising scheme for Mr. McKenzie. "A bigger piece of humbug," says our informant, "could not be, and Mrs. McKenzie, if she would tell the truth, knows it. It is not the first time their names, or rather his name, has appeared in print, and not many months ago it was published in connection with an affair of even more questionable character. The parties are thoroughly unreliable, as all acquainted with them could testify."

We advise the ministers who hav figured in this affair to next time select people of less equivocal reputation to substantiate their claim to being divine healers. And we advise the credulous press of this country, before reprinting this tale, to write to some honorable person in the place and learn the truth.

A Mental Exercise for the Judicially Inclined.

There is at present in this city an English actress whose claim to fame rests principally upon her liaison with a live lord, who is brazen enough to appear as her manager. Her husband travels with them, and by drinking with the lord in the morning and in the afternoon threatening to shoot him, has advertised the actress to such an extent that the theater is crowded every night. The three persons form a moral pest to the community.

Of this woman's public and private career the Sun, of this city, says:

"We are glad that the audience who were present at the first public appearance of the woman who has come over here with an English lord did not make any disturbance in the theater. She is there to be judged solely on her merits as an artist.

"If people object to her manner of life and the methods which hav been used to bring her into notoriety, let them keep aloof from her performances. That is the true way in which to show their disapproval and contempt. If they go to see and hear her, they hav no right to express their feelings against her as a woman to whose conduct outside of the theater they take exception."

There is a case in the West which requires similar nice discrimination in judgment. In Chicago there are a pestilential lot of fellows preaching disruption and Anarchy. At one of their meetings somebody killed several policemen. These pestilential fellows were seized. But when they were tried, the jury found them guilty of being pests and not of killing the officers. It was as though the English woman's acting had been judged by her private life. How few there are who can differentiate facts from prejudices!

Editorial Notes.

SEWARD MITCHELL writes that he will supply several copies of his paper, The World's Reformer, at three cents each. He is sick and not able to travel, and depends upon the sale of this paper for money. His address is Newport, Maine.

ASBURY PARK, N. J., where they arrested for blasphemy a man who said that Christian missions in India are a failure, is put down by the Hotel Gazette as a very dishonest place. "There is," says the Gazette, "a class of hotel men who drag down the fraternity generally. Asbury Park, the sanctimonious place, has been the favorit stamping-ground of these gentry. They imagin that the religious odor of the resort, in which the smell of liquor has no place, is a sufficient recommendation for unlimited credit. This they hav enjoyed in the past to such an extent that every dealer, when a package is sent to that Methodist resort, is very careful to place those mystic letters, 'C. Q. D.,' upon it."

TALMAGE, in his Sunday sermon, declared that "Brooklyn had, fifteen years ago, in its streets no sign of the social evil; but now it is beginning to rival upper Broadway, in New York, and yet not a single minister will say one point-blank word, lest some old libertin should throw up his church pew."

THE Rev. Benjamin F. Staunton is being tried for "unministerial conduct." The proof of the charge is that he paid more attention to another man's wife than to his own. It seems to us that the indictment should be changed to read, "For ministerial conduct." The record of the reverends shows that the minister who is more civil to his own wife than to other men's wives is the exception and not the rule.

THE following letter explains itself, and at the same time acknowledges the receipt of a basket of the finest grapes raised in the state:

"FEED MY LAMBS.

"FRIEND SOMERBY: I make you the custodian of these grapes. I want them divided among my 'pets' in THE TRUTH SEEKER establishment.

"They are not 'my broken body,' but as often as ye partake of them, 'do it in remembrance of me.' JOHN PECK."

AMONG the work that Unity urges the Unitarians to accomplish is the correcting of the "irreligious rationalism and irrational religion of the times." We venture to assure Unity that irreligious rationalism will never be converted by any of the irrational religions that depend upon the barbaric system known as Christianity. Some religion better adapted to the enlightened times in which we liv will hav to be invented, or grown, than is the irrational religion of the New Testament.

ST. PATRICK'S parochial school in Rochester has 638 pupils. A priest givs daily "spiritual instruction" to the children, and daily celebrates mass for their benefit. Another parochial school, the "Immaculate Conception," is about to be opened, with accommodations for "every child in the parish." The development of these schools is a subject of interest to every patriot, and the attitude of the Protestants toward them ought to be carefully noticed. If Protestants send their children to them, our public school system is doomed.

IN an address to the Knights of Labor at Richmond, Governor Lee said: "Employers, as has been well said, hav no right to lock out a whole shopful of hands to bring a few unwilling ones to terms, nor hav they, in my opinion, the right to engage with other employers to fix a rate for them to pay or compel all to remain idle." If Governor Lee is in favor of equal and exact justice, he should hav said that neither hav employees the right to withdraw in a body from a shop to compel employers to find work for a few workmen whom they do not wish to employ. And if employers hav no right, as an associated body, to fix wages, what right hav employees to do so? Very few people in this world can look at both sides of a question. Everybody nowadays is a partisan. "Our" view is the only right view—people who don't agree with us are fools; "we" are the only ones entitled to any rights—the rest of the world must do as we say. It is curious how quick the persecuted become persecutors when they get the upper hand.

THE latest criticism of Charles Dickens comes from the religious people. A writer in the Evangelist complains that Dickens "never found a Christian lady or gentleman in the church; all his good people were outside of the church. His idea of an evangelical clergyman seemed to be a compound of the knave and the sniveling hyprocrit; and his representation of laymen who took an interest in propagating Christianity in foreign parts is that of the most absurd, narrow-minded men and women, caring nothing for the welfare of the poor at home. Hence we hav held up to us such untruthful caricatures as the Chadbands, Stiggins, 'Shepherds,' and the Pecksniffs and Jellybys. On the other hand, he exalted some of his characters in goodness and in deeds of mercy to the highest Christian stamp; but he lets it be understood that they had very little to do with the church!" We do not see the justice of blaming Dickens for portraying what he found in real life. Everybody recognizes the truthfulness of his pictures, and the fault lies in the system that breeds such wretches, and not in him who drags them to the light.

"THE position of woman on the Continent," says a writer in the Christian at Work, "is to our notions very anomalous. As represented by the Virgin Mary, she is adored at the altar, while as actually appearing in the street she is often a menial and a beast of burden. In the chapels of the splendid cathedral her form is draped in richest robes, her head crowned with pearls and brilliants, and before her person, enthroned on a lofty pedestal or altar, an endless procession of devout believers bend their knees and utter their prayers; and yet these same believers will go forth from their adoration of the ideal woman in the cathedral to look upon the real woman sawing wood in the street, or hitched beside a dog to a cart, or digging like a slave in the fields, without the slightest feeling of the degradation to womanhood which such a scene implies. We saw on the way from Brussels to Cologne sometimes three, sometimes four, and in one instance six women to one man gathering harvests in the fields; we saw women begrimed with dirt and black unloading coal cars; we saw women mixing mortar and handling stone; we saw half-grown girls driving dog-carts filled with vegetables to market, and working in various capacities which it made one's heart ache to behold."

A DISPATCH from Cincinnati, where Colonel Ingersoll was at the time engaged in a legal affair, to the Times of this city givs Mr. Ingersoll's views upon the candidacy of Henry George as follows: "In the city of New York the principal question is not who will be the next president, but who will be the next mayor. Personally, I am for Henry George. I want to giv the workingmen an opportunity of showing the world whether they are intelligent enough and honest enough to stand by each other, and to vote the same way they march. We see processions of thousands upon thousands of workingmen carrying all kinds of banners, and, among other things, saying that the workingmen must stand together. Now they will hav their opportunity. Henry George is an intelligent man; something, it may be, of an enthusiast; without doubt honest, and, above all things, a true friend of the working people. Now, I want them to stand by him, and to vote for him, and I am on that side myself. My judgment is that this labor question will enter largely into the next presidential campaign. I would like to see the laboring men succeed. I would like to see them hav a majority in Congress and with a president of their own. I would like to see this, so that they could satisfy themselvs how little, after all, can be accomplished by legislation. The moment responsibility should touch their shoulders they would become conservativ. They would find that making a living in this world is an individual affair, and that each man must look out for himself. They would soon find that the government cannot take care of the people. The people must support the government. Everything cannot be regulated by law. The factors entering into this problem are substantially infinit, and beyond the intellectual grasp of any human being. Perhaps nothing in the world will convince the laboring man how little can be accomplished by law until there is the opportunity of trying."

Lectures and Meetings.

MRS. H. S. LAKE is engaged to speak at Stafford, Conn., the Sundays of October; at Norwich, Conn., the Sundays of November; at Haverhill, Mass., the last two Sundays of December; at Boston, the first two Sundays of February. She desires other Eastern engagements. Address, Stafford, Conn.

J. L. ANDREW lectures for the Friendship Liberal League, Hall and Wood streets, Philadelphia, Sunday, Oct. 17th, at 2:30 and 7:30 o'clock P.M. Subjects, afternoon, "Liberty and Law;" evening, "Modern Infidelity—a Philosophical Defense." Liberals of Philadelphia and vincity are cordially invited to attend. The seats will be free.

CHARLES WATTS's tour in Michigan has been in every way a success. The audiences hav been large and enthusiastic. Sunday night, Oct. 3d, nearly two thousand persons attended his lecture in the Opera House in Grand Rapids. On Monday, Oct. 4th, Mr. Watts gave a political lecture in Grand Rapids. Mr. Watts lectured also in Muskegon, and was highly spoken of. The last lecture Mr. Watts gave in Michigan was at Kalamazoo. The two local papers reported him as being "an eloquent talker."

MRS. C. F. DEMOTT, secretary pro tem of the Hempstead Freethought Society, writes: "The Hempstead Freethought Association removed last week to pleasanter and more spacious quarters at Liberty Hall, next door to the Baptist church. A recitation entitled, 'The Rising Moon,' by Miss Ada DeMott; a talk on 'Earthquakes as Tests of Progress in Theology,' and a select reading from Herbert Spencer were the attractions last Sunday. Several questions in geology and physiology were written by the president, and members requested to find answers for next Sunday. A lecture on 'The Gods of the Ancient World,' a recitation, and a select reading will be given next Sunday afternoon."

MR. J. E. REMSBURG, the famous Infidel author and lecturer, delivered two of his ablest productions in this city on last Friday and Sunday evenings, and those who heard him and were so conditioned as to be able to appreciate eloquent and logical orations, antagonistic to orthodoxy, were astonished and delighted. Athough Mr. Remsburg and his writings are comparativ strangers in this section of the West, his celebrity has penetrated far into foreign lands, and his works hav become standard authority among Freethinkers. As he is but thirty-eight years old, and has hardly reached the climax of mental and physical development, he certainly has a bright career before him, during which, we believe, he will accomplish much toward overthrowing intolerance and superstition and toward the elevation of mankind. He will close a series of eight lectures in this county at Bassett tomorrow evening.—New Hampton (Iowa) Tribune.

W. F. JAMIESON is now in the midst of his debate with Rev. Dr. Ditzler, in Butte, Montana. He gave three lectures in Dillon, M. T., and speaks in glowing terms of the brave band of Liberals there. They elected officers for their Secular Union at the close of his last lecture. The Dillon Examiner contained the following notice, for which a churchman took the editor to task because he gave so favorable a notice to an "Infidel:" "Pursuant to announcements made several days since, on Wednesday evening last Prof. W. F. Jamieson began his course of three lectures at the Court House on various topics in support of Liberalism and freedom in thought and speech. He had fair-sized audiences on both that and the following evening, and entertained his hearers to their evident satisfaction. Mr. Jamieson is a good speaker, having a pleasing address, and is a logical reasoner, going to the bottom of his subject, and advancing no argument that he does not endeavor to thoroughly substantiate by lucid proofs."

C. B. REYNOLDS's article on "Blasphemy and the Bible is now published in pamphlet form illustrated with the cartoon "Casting Pearls Before Swine." It sells for 10 cents.

Letters from Friends.

THURSTON, N. Y., Oct. 5, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: In renewing my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I wish to say that I approve most heartily of nearly all of the illustrations that hav appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER the past summer, and hope they can be continued.

Yours truly, LEWIS MASTERS.

NEWARK, N. J., Oct. 4, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. J. L. Andrew lectured yesterday afternoon before the Liberal League here on "Liberty and Law" before a good audience, which paid the best of attention, with frequent applause. A discussion of the lecture took place immediately following. In the evening, in the same hall, Mr. Andrew again appeared before the Liberals and Spiritualists; subject, "Modern Infidelity." The audience was large and very appreciativ, and many expressed the wish to hav Mr. Andrew with us again. C. F. MARSHALL.

BROOKTON, ME., Sept. 26, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I send you $1 for another four months' subscription to your admirable paper. Were it in my power, I should be only too happy to send you a much larger subscription, besides something additional to assist you in the battle for freedom and humanity which you are fighting so nobly against such odds. It is hardly possible for me to get you any subscribers in this small community, composed largely of church-going hypocrits and disinterested nothingarians; but I will try. You can, however, always count on my subscription as long as I hav a cent, as I would not be without the old TRUTH SEEKER for twice its price.

MARTIN BUTLER.

CHARLES CITY, IA., Sept. 4, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I send you a Catholic paper, with several pieces marked in it, on different subjects. An old wolf, by the name of E. B. Maxwell, left here suddenly. He was an old member of the Congregational church, and a deacon. He tried to ruin two little girls about the age of ten or eleven, but they hav tried to hush it up, for it would injure the church. He was about sixty years old, and had one of his feet partly off. He has gone to Madison, Wis., from here, and has been kissing several of the sisters, so it has come out since he left.

I am trying to get a lecturer to make us a visit and talk some time this winter, if possible, and am hopeful to be able to do so.

The pictures are all O. K., and easy to read. Put them in

JOHN MAHARA.

BRAMPTON, CAN., Sept. 27, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose post-office order for $1.50, for continuation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I believe that will pay up to March 12, 1887. Thanks for sending papers without renewal; they came to hand all right up to date.

I fully agree with W. Malcolm, in the issue of Sept. 25, 1886, as regards Liberalism and Anarchy, and believe to advocate the cause (in any shape) of Anarchists will diminish the circulation of Liberal papers, and do the Liberal cause much harm. E. DALE.

[Mr. Dale will greatly oblige the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER if he will point out when and where THE TRUTH SEEKER ever advocated the cause of Anarchy. We hav advocated the right of even Anarchists to hav a fair trial, but by the comments made we should think there are quite a number of Freethinkers who do not believe in fair trials when an unpopular person is in the prisoner's box.—ED. T. S.]

SOUTH LOWELL, ALA., Sept. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I suggest to the law-making power in the different states that every county be authorized to appoint three or five arbitrators or referees, to whom all civil cases, which would otherwise go to the courts, may be referred; that both plaintiff and defendant be allowed to present their case without the use of a lawyer; and that this board decide on the equity of the case; and that their decision be final, and without the privilege of an appeal.

I think that quarrels between men can thus be settled easier, and with less cost and bad feeling, than in the courts. This system would save lawyers' fees, and continuations, and cases would be decided on their merits and by justice, instead of by law without justice, as is now done. It would lessen our taxes and save trouble.

I hope some state will try this system, and let us learn by experience if there is not some better way than paying lawyers from ten to one hundred dollars a day to settle our difficulties. J. K. DEARTH.

MYRTLE CREEK, ORE., Oct. 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I confess it my duty to my fellow-man and the cause of intellectual liberty to state that the old religious dogmas, superstitions, etc., such as pagan and Christian churches teach in all their creeds, hav been renounced by me as being inimical to human happiness, intellectual progress, and scientific development. I am a poor man; Christians hav robbed me of years of toil, but this is not the reason why I am an advocate of Freethought and intellectual liberty, together with human progress. It is because of investigation, reason, and experience. We can expect nothing but injustice from those who sin on the credit system. They tried to make a preacher of me, but I had some individuality and questioned their authority, for which reason they treated me coolly. Other denominations wanted to ordain me, but I questioned their creeds and authority, so, of course, they had no use for me at all in any way. My investigations went on until the chains of superstitious slavery fell from me, and now my mind floats in a higher atmosphere. The clergy may hurl their anathemas at me; their invocations cannot, with all of their flatteries, change the god of truth, science, or the universe. The early hallucinations of my mind caused me much trouble, being the result of false teaching, which some never unlearn.

False theology is the perpetrator of evil, and perpetuates ignorance and crime; fanaticism, bigotry, and intolerance are its progeny.

Now I am an humble advocate of the religion of humanity. Before the inherent rights of mankind can be restored the cause of intellectual and physical thralldom must be removed.

L. C. HILL.

CHESS.

PASSAIC, N. J., Oct. 5, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: To-day (Sunday) I examined several dried specimens of European and American chess (Bromus secalinus), and can say that botanically they hav no affinity with wheat (Trixicum vulgare), except that chess belongs to the same nat. ord., graminaceæ or grass family. That they belong to distinct genera should be enough to convince anybody of the impossibility of either degenerating or running into the other. But, further, they belong to different subtribes of one big tribe of the order—not even allied genera. It is only by hybridization that wheat could degenerate at all, and then only with species of the same genus. For chess to grow amongst wheat, seed must hav been sown with it, or else hav lain in the ground. Not otherwise, because it is an annual. Chess could not develop by spontaneous generation, and Freethinkers ought not to be the people who could think so. The "smattering of science" which all, or most, hav should put them right on such a question. Evolution is the word, and chess probably took as long to evolve as wheat, and stands as high in the vegetable kingdom.

Allow me to remark, anent that Charleston cartoon, it was quite providential so many people got out of that building in such good order before it finally fell.

T. D. HATFIELD.

HUBBARD, Mo., Sept. 30, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Thou friend of the human race! please find inclosed draft for $2 on the National Bank of Commerce, the same to apply on the C. B. Reynolds's blasphemy persecution fund. Please credit $1 of the same to Mr. Isaac Michaels, of Moberly, Mo., and $1 to me. Friend Michaels will try to raise more money among the Liberals of Moberly for Brother Reynolds. Don't despair, Brother Reynolds; we are your friends in adversity as well as in prosperity. We hope you will not try to defeat those swine in their own courts, but carry the case to the highest tribunal in our land, which we hope will decide those barbarous laws unconstitutional.

Although we are limited in means, friend Michaels and I will swell this fund $25 each, if it is necessary. My watch is also at your disposal provided the good brothers and sisters will raise the balance. We mean business; just try us and see. Furthermore, I wish it recorded that friend Michaels and I always hav a dollar or more to defend any Liberal who happens to get into the clutches of such unjust laws for exercising the freedom of speech, even to the uttermost ends of the world. So go on, brave Reynolds, while below, in the sure paths of truth.

Now, old Democracy, the party of my sire, dost thou remember when thou didst loudly howl to get into power, and didst obtain my vote for every president since I reached my majority by quoting these immortal lines:

Giv us the freedom of speech and the press;
A jury impartial selected to try us if laws we transgress.
Giv us a union of peaceful souls blending,
Whose millions of hearts throb as one,
The rights of our fathers defending,
To throttle the freedom of none!

O Jersey, blush for shame! Unjust are thy laws, and the spirit of those lines does not dwell in your state. Verily, Captain Huddy's blood doth cry out against you, and call thee a stiff-necked and selfish generation! JOHN TRUEBLOOD.

CHARLEVOIX, MICH., Sept. 26, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Three months hav almost passed since I was admonished by the tag on my paper that I was reading a paper for which I had not paid.

From week to week I hav been doing so, still hoping that in a few days I would be able to get enough of the root together to pay thee all, and now I am happy to be able to ask you for credit for the inclosed, and to thank you for continuing my paper, pictures and all. I am one of those unfortunate fellows that our very excellent president says "contracted a great amount of disability" whilst in what would now seem to hav been the wrong army; consequently, by reason of such disability, it is hard at all times to make both ends meet. We hav stomachs that crave their daily allowance, and bodies that must hav the wherewithal to be clothed, and souls—ah! there's the rub!—that need to be refreshed, and how is that to be done without proper reading matter. And where can that be found save in the old TRUTH SEEKER? Therefore, I make an extra effort to continue my subscription.

This soul that it requires such extra efforts to save is something that I really know nothing about, only what I hav learned by hearsay. The preachers tell us a great deal about it, and, of course, they would not talk about things they did not know all about. I never saw a soul separate from the body, but I hav realized that I hav a mind, and I hav also realized that its action depends greatly on the condition of the body. Whether it will exist after the body has been returned to Mother Earth is a question for theorists to speculate on. For me, I know only of its present existence, and that it derives pleasures and experiences pain from present surroundings. Among its greatest delights is the perusal of the able articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER, editorial and contributed, and, above all, in contemplating those pictures, that really speak so much plainer than words.

ROBERT MILLER.

PARSIPPANY, N. J., Oct. 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: J. L. Andrew delivered three lectures in Pythian Hall, Boonton, N. J., Saturday, September 25th, and Sunday, September 26th. Saturday night he spoke on "Liberty and Law." Sunday afternoon the meeting was opened with singing (same at the close of the lecture and evening too) a Liberal hymn by the members of the Secular Union. The young lady musician, Miss Ada Booth, played on the organ. This time when the young lecturer stepped on the platform we knew we were going to hav a good one, for we were there and all were ready to listen to "Modern Infidelity." When speaking of the ministers, in regard to what they think they know, he said, in the words of Colonel Ingersoll: "'The clergy know that I know that they do not know.'" It was a stirring lecture, as was shown by the attention and applause that greeted its delivery before it was ended. Sunday evening a larger audience; subject, "Christianity and Civilization." He said Christianity is today what it always has been, the enemy of reason and freedom. Its malice is as poisonous as it ever was. The Catholics and Methodists are despots alike. What has it done in civilizing the people, anyway? The truth of the whole thing is, It has made more enemies than it has ever made friends. When Reynolds pitched his tent here for the purpose of gathering in the orthodox brethren and enlightening them, we presume, on all that relates to Secularism, and the absurdities of the Bible, they who caused his arrest were nothing but downright, narrow-minded, orthodox blockheads. The tent movement is a good one for the cause of spreading Freethought, and if there is any lecturer at this moment who needs to be encouraged and make a tour through the East and West to lecture, it is C. B. Reynolds. All able Liberal speakers should be kept constantly in the lecture field. THE TRUTH SEEKER illustrations, though not liked by and ridiculous to some, are up to the point in showing the people how absurd the Bible is when illustrated as well as read. We want more stirring lectures in this town, and mean to have them as time passes on. Honor bright! we mean what we say. Music is a magnet, and music, and singing too, we will hav at the lectures. So wake up, Liberals, and keep the Freethought lecturers lecturing as long as the preachers preach.

FLORENCE HENNION,
Secretary of Boonton Secular Union.

LIBERALISM VERSUS ANARCHISM.

HOLDEN, Mo., Sept. 28, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: During the short time I hav been a subscriber for your paper I hav received the worth of the money invested, especially in the articles by John Peck. I hav, however, seen in it some tendency to Anarchy, which I deplore. In your last issue you giv your own views on that subject, with some very sensible prelusory remarks by John Ray. I am a Freethinker from far back, but see no necessary relation between my views and Anarchy, but the reverse.

Since you giv such unbounded latitude to free expression of opinions, it would be but consistency to giv place to what I now hav to say, though differing with yourself. You say you differ in toto from the principles of the Anarchists, but say further on: "Freethought, as we understand it, stands for absolute freedom of thought, of speech, of publication, upon any and every subject upon earth. There is no such thing as treasonable utterance in this country." A hint is thrown out, too, that Freethinkers should hav such fear of restraint on the subject of religion that they should indulge all phases of Freethought and expression.

The Constitution givs us all free scope to think, and to worship, or not worship, as we please. So we need not be frightened nor fly off in wrong and dangerous extremes on other subjects.

I do not believe that anybody has a moral right, or legal right, either, to call crowds of people together and harang them with abuse of our form of government, and thus incite them to acts of crime, as Anarchists are wont to do, and did do at the fatal Haymarket meeting. If men should ever be hung for anything, they certainly should be hung for such acts as that.

Government is, of necessity, a compromise. No government is absolutely free. Ours is as free as it can be and reserve to itself the right and power to protect itself and its citizens. Those people are mistaken as to what is a free government. If they don't like our laws, let them leave the country. Our government is free because it protects its citizens in all just rights, bestows the greatest blessing on the greatest number, and reserves the right and the power to protect itself.

Again, in noticing a meeting held to welcome late arrivals of foreign Socialists who come here to orate and disturb the peace of your city, you say: "The police were on hand and were very officious, but failed to create a disturbance." Bah! If Mr. Andrew and Mr. Stevens are with you on this subject, and if you all hold the views of Mrs. Helen Wilmans, as quoted by you, I regret that you hav not, at least, her prudence.

Finally, I say, Yes, we should maintain the right, and the rights even of an enemy, but we should not maintain nor indorse the wrongs of either friends or enemies. I think you are too tender in your sympathies for the Anarchists for the good of your paper and for the good of Liberalism.

C. L. CARTER, M.D.

NORTH SYDNEY, N. S., Oct. 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: If you hav room in your best of all papers for a few jottings, I will trouble you with a partial account of my travels from West to East. We—that is, Mrs. Archibald, our little girl, and myself—left Omaha on September 9th. Having some business with Mr. Wettstein, we looked off at Rochelle. And let me say right here that I found Brother Wettstein a host in himself, nicely situated in a pretty little town. We were invited to his house, and there partook of the good things of life provided by Mrs. Wettstein, who is a lady of refinement, and one who knows how to make things comfortable for both the outer and the inner man. Now, I wish to say right here to all readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, if you want to buy a watch or any jewelry, be sure and send to Wettstein; if you want a watch repaired, send to Wettstein. For in either case you will get a better job done or a better watch for less money than you could any place else that I know of. And at the same time you will be patronizing a true Liberal.

In Chicago, the excitement, to a casual observer, had disappeared, although there is yet an undercurrent of feeling not soon to subside, and if the penalty of the law is carried out on those convicted, the act will never be forgiven.

In passing through Ontario we see some beautiful country, as good as any portion of the United States, if properly managed. On arriving in the, we might say, ancient city of Montreal, we find several extremes. First we notice the very narrow streets, which are no better than alleys in Chicago; but we also find some very fine buildings—though, sad to say, the finest are dedicated to superstition. One of the finest, not-yet finished, is the bishop's palace, which is of gigantic proportions, finished so far in the best style. Then we became of a religious turn of mind and visited two of those holies of holies, houses of God. First we visited the Jesuit church, which is a fine building, finished internally in splendid shape. The arches are supported with twenty-four pillars. It is lighted by seventy-five gas jets, and would hold some fifteen hundred people; but this Sunday evening there were about one hundred and fifty dupes in attendance, and, as near as I could calculate, there were five females to one male. All of them, as they came down the aisle, bowed to some image, crossed themselvs, and entered their seats. Poor slaves!

On Monday we visited the Notre Dame cathedral. There you see, at all hours of the day, poor dupes bowing at some shrine, crossing themselvs, and saying their prayers; but the worst and most disgusting sight I there beheld was several women bowing and praying before a horrid sight supposed to be Jesus as he hung on the cross. There were, in very life-like or natural appearance, the disgusting wounds of the nails and the wounds in his side, all of which were so very disgusting that we passed by as quickly as possible, for such sights are very offensiv to me. But there they were, worshiping this hideous sight; and in this case, from actual count, there were ten women to one man. My thoughts were, Let us Liberals speak out, lend a helping hand, lift our sisters out of the superstitious ruts, open the doors of education to them, giv them what honestly belongs to them, and the rights men claim, and in a short time we will not be able to count ten to one in such a place.

But now we are in the land of the Mayflower, where for the present we purpose to locate, and from whence I will be pleased to giv you some jottings from time to time as they occur to me in my travels through the country—which, I am sorry to say, is full to the overflowing of rank superstition.

J. W. ARCHIBALD.

NORTH PARMA, N. Y., Oct. 3, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been thinking for some time that the first opportunity I had I should pitch into Brother Macdonald, and giv him a mild piece of mind, on account of the semi-support and comfort which the Chicago Anarchists derive from the attitude of THE TRUTH SEEKER in regard to them. Not that I entertain the idea that you believe in the damnable doctrins and ideas promulgated by them, but by even casually reading some of the communications and editorial comments which appear in THE TRUTH SEEKER upon the deeds and doings of the scoundrels who go by the name of Socialists and Anarchists you can perceive a vein of sympathy which they ill deserve. You may reply that Spies, Parsons, and Fielden, did not throw the bomb that caused the brutal murder of the Chicago policemen while nobly doing their duty. But I consider Spies guilty as an accessory to their murder, from the hellish ideas which he formulated and published in his paper. Parsons and the rest of the gang are equally responsible for, by their treasonable and incendiary speeches, urging the mob to resort to deeds of violence and murder, in order to redress some fancied wrong. I hav not a particle of sympathy for them, and hope they will receive their just deserts, which I believe to be hanging. I cannot see how intelligent, loyal men, who love their country and its good, can for one moment hav one particle of fellowship for them. Individuals who came here from the slums and gutters of Europe, where they hav suffered degradation and poverty all of their lives, been poorly paid and illy fed and clothed—I say, come here, where the laborer is the best paid, fed, clothed, and housed of any country in the world, his children schooled, and, if industrious, temperate, and sober, can lay up something for old age—when they come here, and try to tear down society, aud undermine good government, and everything else that pertains to the good and welfare of the community, it is quite time that something should be done to stamp out and counteract their bad influence. To every good, honest emigrant who comes here to better his condition, and build up a home, educate his children, and become a good, loyal citizen, and if he has any real wrongs that need redress, endeavor to right them, not by the incendiaries' torch, and murderous bomb, but by the ballot—to every such emigrant I will extend both hands and giv a cordial welcome.

Now, Brother Macdonald, I am not going to flare up and say, if you don't do thus and so, I will "stop my paper." Not I. For I like the old TRUTH SEEKER too well to do that. But when I read articles published in it and indorsed by its editor that my intelligence teaches me will result disastrously to the paper and the cause of Liberalism, I feel it a duty to giv a warning note. You must be aware of the fact that there are plenty of people who are ready to make Liberalism and Anarchism synonymous terms. They confound Infidelity as only another name for everything that is low and vile. Let us teach them by our lives and example that it is a vile slander. The majority of the Liberals in this locality are among its best and most upright citizens, being found upon the side of law and order, temperance and honesty, benevolence and love for their fellow-men. Dr. Samuel Holman, a pronounced Liberal, has done more to make the town of Parma a practical temperance town than all of the churches combined.

J. TOMPKINS.

BELGRADE, MINN., Sept. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: An old Freethinker as I am, and having come over to this country nearly thirty years ago with the very same fundamental principles of Freethought that I hav now, I could not help watching the religious as well as the social life of the people of this country, who hav and enjoy a Constitution that says distinctly that the greatest possible happiness of the people was and is its object. What every newcomer, with sense of observation; what every traveler from Europe, except from the Puritan parts of England and Scotland, will find and be astonished at, is that the life of the people in this country, in comparison with continental Europe, is so very dull and monotonous. "What!" exclaims the immigrant or traveler, "such a great country, healthy, with plenty of room for everybody—or at least for many millions more—with the most fertil soil in all the world, with the freest Constitution, and the people, who hav plenty of all, and nobody to hinder them in their happiness, leading a monotonous social life!" Yes, in spite of all that, it is a fact. We soon found out what was the cause—the Puritan spirit of the people. Puritan laws and obstructions to mental and social liberty had indeed been mostly abolished, but the people, having been trained under those laws for over two hundred years, could not, and at the present day cannot—partially, at least—banish the Puritan spirit. I landed in New England—Boston—and stayed there one year, and asked myself all the time, "What is the use of the greatest political liberty to man, if he is deprived of his social liberty—if he cannot enjoy his life?" I went to Wisconsin, and there we had, and in some places they still hav, social liberty. Life then was very pleasant and free. The two most prominent parts of the population there, Americans and Germans, were living in the best harmony, one learning from the other. The Freethinkers among both nations rejoiced in their mixture, and hoped that a new, free, and more joyful social life of the people in general would be the result thereof. We started music bands and singing societies, and had excursions with musie and song—unknown then in New England. We celebrated the Fourth of July, when it fell upon a Sabbath, on that day. In short, we worked and enjoyed ourselvs. We had our turn-verein, where, as a matter of course, mental liberty was cultivated. But it soon changed. Puritanism from the East immigrated in full force and went to work, destroying all the weaker strongholds of Freethought, and, especially in the country among the farmers, all the joyful social life, making the people bigoted and devout, and, consequently, social life monotonous and dull. They enunciated and enforced the old sentence, ora et labora—pray and work. Before we could realize it, all our doings were simply wicked. Our turn-vereins were wicked, singvereins wicked, picnics with beer wicked, excursions with beer wicked, Fourth of July on Sunday extremely wicked. We were wicked all over. We received private instructions, especially from the ladies, like children in the nursery. It sounded from all sides: "You must not, you must not!" Why? "Because it is wicked and your soul will be lost. Go to church and you will do better"—i.e., you will make more money. Well, soon the Americans retired from us, and we were left alone. The former Freethinking Americans kept silent, and gave to churches as much as anybody.

I admit that we had not always refined social enjoyments. How could we with a people of such different grades of education? But we brought at least the sense of social enjoyment to this country, and if the Americans had not retired and had not branded everything we did in that line with, "Dutch," "Sour-krout," "Lager and pretzel," they might hav improved and ennobled our public social life and at the same time kept away from themselvs the monotony and dulness of a Puritan life. They liked and do like lager, but for fear of their reverends and their reverend-ridden ladies, they went back to their inherited national Bourbon, because they could and can hide before their eyes a whisky-bottle, on account of its stronger contents and smaller size, better than a beer-bottle—one small drink of whisky bringing on the desired effect quicker than two bottles of lager. So it was done and so it is done.

And where would Prohibition be in any state if the people knew that they could get no whisky at all except for real sickness? Prohibition is nothing else than voting up the bottle of whisky—a poison, as we all admit, and a very dangerous one, too—and voting down the lager beer, a beverage which has proved its healthful influence on the physical and mental constitution of whole nations who hav drunk it for thousands of years. He who does not believe that fact on simple assertion from men who know it may go over to Germany and see for himself. Prohibition means whisky against beer, and a Prohibition man is almost always not free in his heart from the principles of the old Knownothing party. Banish in common life whisky and all these distilled drinks and use them only for medicin, and drink beer instead, and you will hav a temperate people, and only then. The public opinion must be brought to that high standpoint which it has in this regard in continental Europe—Russia excepted—of holding that a man who drinks more than one small glass of whisky at one sitting loses his character as a gentleman in the eyes of the looker-on.

Banish the beer as a beverage for social meetings and you banish social enjoyment, for the people in general will not enjoy themselvs sitting by a water-bowl, and if all the Prohibition men of this continent will stand on their heads and insist on the truth of the contrary, then, with social enjoyment gone, what will the people do, what can they do, especially on Sundays, but go to church? This our rever ends know too well, and from that—not from our Infidelity, for what do they care for the soul of a Dutchman, whom they despise deeply on earth?—comes their intense hatred of and opposition to our social enjoyment. A nice, joyful social life makes empty churches, and they know that.

Observing that this Puritan spirit would wipe away every bit of earthly joy in this country, we German Freethinkers felt sorry enough and mourned—the more so as we saw that we could not even keep our children out of the general current of superstition. And it is only since late—say fifteen years—that we find encouragement, and a good, earnest, and strong one, too, from the side of our American fellow-citizens; and you will find us not wanting. "One world at a time"—good; but let us make this our world so that we can enjoy it. To accomplish that end, we must do away not only with religious superstition, but also with whisky—the greatest enemies of America. Prohibition is the third, because it works—known or unknown to the worker—arm-in-arm with whisky and destroys personal liberty in a worse degree than all the despotic governments of the world combined. Rather liv in Russia than in Iowa or Kansas; rather liv in Rome than in a Puritan state; rather send a child to the pope's own private Sunday-school than to one conducted by a hypocritical future bank-defaulter; rather be enveloped in the thickest coat of superstition and enjoy life than be the freest of Freethinkers and be prohibited from enjoying life. Work and joy must be our motto. What is an old, sour Prohibitionist good for socially?

VERITAS.

BARRE, MASS., Oct. 2, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Hasn't your correspondent, George Lynn, made a mistake? I see in his letter, Oct. 2d, an allusion to myself, and wish to say in as far as concerns his insinuation, "My Spiritualism does not, did not, rest on any Bouton foundation," that my disbelief in Spiritualism does not, did not, rest on the exposure of any Bouton fraud, I having had for many, many years the best of reasons for believing in the non-existence of spirits; consequently the Bouton exposure was no confirmation to me of fraud or guilt.

It matters not to me whether George Lynn and "all Spiritualists" are moved or "unmoved at this exposure;" there is the solid fact and they can do what they please with it.

Mr. Lynn's flings at the "'I told you so's'" and "'I knew it's'" comes with a very ill grace from one who uses nearly a column and a half of THE TRUTH SEEKER bewailing the intolerance of Liberals, and comparing such to "intolerant, persecuting Christians," who, he says, "will hav general cause of jubilation as they observe what splendid imitators many Liberals are of those peculiar traits that we said Christians alone would manifest."

Mr. Lynn is at liberty to ask Mr. Walser if "I" did not "tell him so" five months previous to the fire, describing the trap-door and other appurtenances during these five months precisely as the fire revealed them, for "I knew it" just as well as if I had performed the tricks myself; and, more than this, I knew who were Dr. Bouton's assistants; and had I not a right to tell Mr. Walser what "I knew" when I saw him so unmercifully deceived? Why, Mr. Lynn, are you not "happy to the full whenever a Dr. Bouton or some similar fraud is exposed?" You being a Spiritualist, one would suppose you would be more happy than myself to detect imposture in your ranks, if it existed, and bring the perpetrators to justice. I confess I was "happy," but not "to the full"—that cannot be until the last fraud is detected, exposed, and eradicated—but I was happy that the fire had revealed unmistakably to the eyes of Mr. Walser, and others, what I had failed to make him perceive; for, like too many others, he was so sure there could be no collusion, that instead of examining, as I begged him to do, he only attempted to argue the question with me. I say this with all due respect to Mr. Walser's sincerity and honesty, for honest he most assuredly was, as honest as you and other similar victims. Mind you, I do not call you, him, and others "mud-slingers," "dirt battalions," and similar names, and use such malignant epithets as I hav had applied to me by the opposition. This shows for itself which is the most intolerant.

If you "elect to go with the latter" (Heywood and Walker) I'm glad you told us so, recent developments in the Walker case having proved where he stands practically on the subject you introduced. As for me, I still stand where I always did, and am very happy to find Messrs. Walser and Stewart on the same side of the question as myself.

"For one, I would rather be gagged by Christianity than by any Puritanic form of Liberalism." "Gagged!" Who wishes to gag Mr. Lynn? I'm sure I don't. If he refers to the late attempt of Mr. Walser's to prevent promiscuity from overruling his colony, I pity him. I consider that Mr. Walser had a perfect right to try, by all lawful and laudable means, to prevent such a calamity, for what respectable person would desire to settle in a colony of promiscuists?

As to temperance, it is nearly sixty years since I made my first effort in that direction, as I can prove by living witnesses, and that effort was a practical one, I using every cent of money I had ever possessed to hire a boy two years younger than myself not to drink New England rum with his father's workmen—and that boy was my own brother. And from that hour to this I hav never ceased my efforts in the cause of temperance, advocating Prohibition in my lectures while the masses opposed it.

It is hard for me, I admit, to tolerate intemperance, promiscuity, and fraud, but the hardest of all to bear is the very intolerance which Mr. Lynn condemns, resulting in flings, sarcasms, misrepresentations, and as odious names and epithets as a bar-room politician can use against his rival. But I forbear. Let us hav peace.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Benevolent Bishop.

FROM THE GERMAN.

A pious old bishop went out for a stroll;
Fat, rosy, content from his feet to his poll.
No hope of the future earth's comfort denied,
The goods of the present him quite satisfied.

With beneficent smile he passed down the street,
When a poor luckless beggar he happened to meet.
"My lord," cried the beggar, "I'm down in my luck,
And e'en for a dinner I really am stuck;

"If, out of your plenty, a dollar you'll spare,
My days that are dark will appear clear and fair."
"A dollar! Why, man, you must surely be mad!
Pray, why didn't you ask me for all that I had?"

"Then giv me a half, it will help my need sore, I'll glad take a half if I cannot get more."
"You're crazy!" the bishop cried out in his wrath;
"I'd as soon giv the whole as giv you a half."

"Then please giv a quarter—that's little enough;
Hav tender regard for my lot that is tough."
"No! no!" cried the bishop; "nothing such will I do;
Do I look like a man to giv quarter to you?"

"Then giv me a cent—that much you'll not miss—
And the hem of your coat I humbly will kiss."
Without any "hem," and without any "ha,"
The bishop cried out, "Now get you gone far!
Or else, by my faith, my design shall not fail
To hav you arrested and taken to jail."

"My lord! Be not harsh, some compassion pray feel;
For, see at your feet I most anxiously kneel.
My lord! Let your blessing my sorrows enfold,
It may bring me luck somewhere else to get gold."

Oh! broad was the smile on the bishop's broad face,
As the beggar he saw in that lowly place!
"My son! that I'll giv," and his hands he stretched out,
When up sprang the beggar, and said, with a shout,
"If your blessing to you had been worth a penny,
You'd not giv it. No! Thanks, I'll go without any.
I think in my heart that you couldn't be worse;
I'm sure that your blessing is not worth a curse!"

Why Freethought Is Superior To Christianity.

[Three months ago, through the kindness of a friend, we were enabled to offer three dollars as a prize for the best essay on Freethought—its superiority over Christianity—competitors to be under twenty years of age. We print to-day the well-written essay on the above-named subject that takes the prize.—Ed. C. C.]

Did you notice a picture that appeared in the Ironclad Age over a year ago? It was the death-bed of a vivisectionist. All the ghosts of animals he had murdered thronged around him in the most horrible form, dogs, cats, and rabbits staring in his face. If he turned from one, he would face another.

The mind that is enslaved by Christianity is in the same condition. It is not free. It is a slave to the most hideous tales. The devil grins in its face, daring it to take refuge in the pursuit of knowledge.

The mind that is free daily becomes more enlightened, soaring on the brilliant wings of thought. It can dive deep into the mysteries of the past. It can investigate the cause of life. It can appreciate the sublime and the beautiful. It can soar up among the worlds that render night beautiful, without thinking they are just small sparks of fire put there for no purpose. Freethought diffuses its knowledge among others. The very name of Freethought pictures all that is kind, gentle, noble, and grand; something that is ever struggling to rise.

The history of Christianity is all that is wicked, torturing, lawless, and conservativ. Christianity is attempting to pull progress down, while Freethought is ever helping it to rise. Christianity prowls around filling people's minds with fables that are so big there is no room for anything else.

What is there worse than a mind not free?

When I was very small I used to read the Bible, all about the plagues that Moses and God inflicted on Pharaoh. It invariably says, "And the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart." I thought it very strange that God would harden his heart and then punish him because it was hardened. I did not ask anyone to explain it, as I thought it would be sin to even be surprised at anything God did, much less doubt that it was right. So it is with older Christians. Christianity inspires its victims with the fear that God will open the earth and swallow them up. It bids everybody be miserable, so as to be able to enjoy heaven hereafter. It teaches us that the devil controls enjoyment. Freethought teaches us to be happy now.

Freethinkers are intelligent, while the weakest-minded people are Christians. The negroes are a very religious race of people, and very ignorant. It has always been a mystery why any intelligent people would take up with such a horrible branch of religion as Christianity.

Christianity is very unjust to women; it bids them know nothing only what they can learn by asking their husbands at home. Freethought teaches them to be ever on the search for knowledge, not to be safely contented with what is told them, but to be truth seekers themselvs.

It is dreadful—a religion that weakens women's minds. Christianity has for age after age harped on the subject of woman's inferiority, until it has at last convinced her that she is a miserable wretch created simply to brighten life's journey for some man.

The mind cannot develop unless it is free. What a pitiful sight it is to see the most ethereal part of man, the mind, clogged up with a superstitious fear of hell. Superstition and ignorance walk hand in hand. The mind of man is what has caused advancement; let that be free, and the world will not fall back into barbarism. All through the ages there hav been Freethinkers who hav made valuable discoveries. Yes, in spite of all opposition, their minds were free and far-seeing.

How did Christianity reward these Freethinkers who did so much for the world's advancement?

It slew them. It built fires and burnt them. Imagin the noble Bruno burning; hissing flames curling around him, baking the flesh ere life is extinct; the scene made more hideous by the presence of sleek, fat, and gloating monks. Only to think how a noble man, who sought only to do good, was martyred, was tortured that he might confess that he had done wrong. That is the way Christianity treats those who do not believe in it. Freethought begs everybody to think freely, and therefore admits of no persecution.

Christianity has always been an enemy to knowledge and philosophy. Recall the history of Hypatia. She was a pagan philosopher, both young and beautiful. She endeavored to spread her advanced ideas among her fellow-creatures, and the wisest people went to hear her lectures. She was not a Christian. A mob was excited. One morning when she started to the hall in which she lectured, she was seized by a mob of bishops and monks; they dragged her along the road most cruelly and killed her. After she was dead they scraped the flesh from her bones.

This is the way Christianity rewarded philosophy. She was the last of the ancient philosophers. Christianity got possession of progress, and the world relapsed into the Dark Ages. Darlina Bell (age 18 years).

A central letter still is seen
Just like the first one, placed between;
And this with those by fours combines,
First, showing military mines;
Next, starch of palms in little grains,
Webster the whole, "Swiss cheese," explains.
The central three away you take—
(Reversed 'tis Egypt's hooded snake),
And still, though strange, there yet remains
That same palm starch in little grains.
And now within this cheese-rim bound
Behold what may reversed be found;
So bound, first is elastic, rare,
A fluid in the form of air;
The next, of letters also three,
A noted mineral spring we see.
Reversed in these from side to side

Correspondence.

Wheeler, Ill., Sept. 29, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: I am nine years old. I hav two brothers and two sisters. We liv on a farm four miles from Wheeler. We went to hear Mr. Bell lecture. The house was full. He made the people laugh at what he said. Pa brought him home with us the next day. He said he would show pa how to play old sledge, and pa beat him. We had a good time while Mr. Bell was here. I would like to hav the little girls write to me.

Emma E. Hess.

Baxter Springs, Kan., Sept. 27, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: I did not see any letter in the Children's Corner this week, so I thought I would write one. I am at my grandpa's, yet my letter took him by surprise, as I intended it should. I think he livs in the pleasantest part of the city. His house fronts two streets—Main on the west, and Council on the south. It is one block east from the school-house, and one block west of the Chalybeate Springs. We can see the bath-house and the band-stand from here. The grove is so tall and thick we cannot see the pagodas where the springs are. The park is a great resort for pleasure-seekers; there is a picnic every few days there. Thanks for the book I received from Oregon. Julia D. Smith, received your kind letter. Will send you my photo when I get one taken; also, some patches for your quilt. Thanks for the flowers. Write again. Grandpa thinks The Truth Seeker the best paper printed. He wishes everyone would read "The Church and its Influence," commenced in the issue of September 18th, on the 594th page. Excuse mistakes. I will try and do better next time. Bertha M. Ferris.

Daleville, Ind., Sept 29, 1886.

Miss Susan H. Wixon: I hav desired to write to you since I hav been reading The Truth Seeker. Last night I went to a rally, one might call it, but they called it a meeting. Such whooping and yelling I never heard. They would all pray at once for awhile, then part would sing, part would talk, part would pray, and the other part would dance, all at once. They had seven trances. One little boy went in four trances and didn't know what he was doing it for; they made him believe that if he didn't do so he would go to the bad place, as some of them call it; he was like some of the elder ones, he didn't know any better. Then there was a young woman went in three trances; she would always manage to get to a certain young man before she fell in her trances. Some of the converts would say, "You know me, and hav known me all my life." So we hav, and there never was a harder set in the country. One of them says he was cured of the rheumatism by the power, but I can't swallow it. We hav some friends that are as good people as ever breathed. Because they are Freethinkers, these fools will talk and bemean them till a dog wouldn't lick their blood. The converts say, "There's no man, woman, or child that will get up and say there is no heaven and hell, and such power as they hav, and that Christ is not the son of God, and prove it by the Bible." I am thinking they are a little off. There are a great many smarter men than they are. There is Robert Ingersoll, Mr. Reynolds, Cousin John Remsburg, and several more men that could get away with them so quick they wouldn't know where they were or ever would be, and here they will get down on there all fours, one might say, and point upwards, no difference what time it was. The geography tells me the earth turns round. I'd like to know what makes them point upwards, for they surely must stand on their heads a part of the time. My father takes The Truth Seeker; my mother is a Freethinker, and so am I, and all the rest of the family. I guess I will close for this time, for I expect I hav written so much nonsense it will be good for the waste basket. Anyway, if it does, I will hope good success to the Children's Corner.

Sallie Remsburg.

P.S.—I will send for some questions for the Christians as soon as I can. S. A. R.

THE RISE OF

INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY

From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

WHAT'S TO BE DONE?

A NIHILISTIC ROMANCE.

By N. G. TCHERNYCHEWSKY. With a portrait of the Author. Translated by BENJ. R. TUCKER.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

Poetry.

Life.

The hill of life is rugged, rough, and high,
So he who must its summit make, or try,
Should search not long for graded paths to tread.
But grasp his pick or spade and dash ahead,
And he'll succeed.

Through bog and bramble, over flood and stone,
He hews his pathway to the hights alone,
Where 'mid the grandeur of ethereal snow,
He lays aside his pick and—flits below.
Such is life.

What else is life, what mission to fulfill,
Except to climb this rugged, rocky hill—
To leave youth's sunny plains and blindly grope
Across the summit, down the other slope—
To be forgotten?

They say that "life is real," and "the grave
Is not its goal;" that "blood of Gods will save."
O man! of millions crossing the divide,
Who has reported from the other side,
Or told the tale alike?

The question, whether life would be his choice,
Is never offered him to giv his voice,
Yet nature forms him blindly to fulfill
Her purposes, and clamber up this hill,
As best he can.

Through all past time he did not liv, nor knows
Of grief nor gladness in that long repose.
Upon a time he'll pass the summit o'er
And differ not from what he was before—
A part of nature.

We only know he lived from marks he made
Along his pathway with his pick or spade.
How earnestly he labored, or how well,
These fading marks are all that's left to tell.
And this is life.

Nor sacrifice nor prayer can furnish cause
To change the permanence of nature's laws;
All throbbing life within her wide domain
Is but secretion, activ in her frame,
And must within her boundless realms remain.

Omaha, Neb. GEO. SMITH.

Grandma Theology to C. B. Reynolds.

Oh, Mr. Reynolds, deary me!
What hev yu ben a-doin'?
What wicked ways and crooked paths
Hev yu ben found pursuin'?
Yu ought ter no ef yu blasphemed,
God's righteous indignation
Would sarch for yu on Jersey sile,
And hurl yu tu damnation.

Wy, Mr. Reynolds, don't yu no
That God himself repented
He'd manufactured human folks,
Coz they got discontented?
An' now yu go to plagin' him
By tellin' Jersey pepul
That they can save themselvs without
A parson or a steepul!

Wy, Mr. Reynolds, ain't yu 'fraid
Yu'll die without a warnin',
An' God will hide his eyes from yu*
Becoz yu've ben a-scornin'?
He'll laf at yure calamity,†
And mock tu see yure frightnin';
I tel yu wot, that da'll be wuss
Than modern Jersey lightnin'.

I gess yu'll wish that yu had ben
A reglar mean old sinner,
An' lied, an' swore, an' murdered, tu,
An' stole yure Sunday dinner;
For then when yu could do no more,
Old age an' chance preventin',
Yure sins, tho scarlet, white as snow‡
Would turn by yure repentin'.

Yu'd best repent at once, or else
Yu'll hear on judgment mornin',
When goats are called, this sentence just:
"For C. B. Reynolds's scornin';
Three weeks in sheol just to test
His fireproof suit of kersey;
Then he's condemned to lower realms,
Called Boonton, in New Jersey."

Oh, dear me. suz! yu mustn't talk
'Bout Bibul contradictions;
The carnal mind can't understand
God's ways an' seemin' fictions.
Yure argymunts are strong, I no,
With facks that yu ar fetchin',
But, Lordy massy! deekin sez,
That such air facks ar "ketchin."

Wy, Mr. Reynolds, don't yu no,
Ef yu keep on a-preachin',
Our meetin'-houses will giv way
Tu skules an' honest teachin'?
Yure rank blasphemin' helps to bring
The world more on a level,
An', just think, folks won't be afraid
Of hell, or of the devil.

They'll leave the good old prayin' times
For deeds of airthly beauty;
They'll lose their faith an' aim to know
An' practice truth an' duty;
They'll try to liv all right on earth,
An' thro this heathen leaven
I'm 'fraid they'll laf at savin' grace,
An' airn an' make a heaven.

The fifty-fifth exhibition of the American Institute was opened Sept. 29th by an address from William Rutter, Esq., of the board of trustees. Ample as the grounds of the Institute are, occupying the entire block from Sixty-third to Sixty-fourth street, and from Second to Third avenues, they are inadequate to accommodate one-half the applications for space. Every accommodation is afforded by the trustees for refreshments inside the building, so that parties spending the day in the building will not be under the necessity of going out. Open evenings until 10 P.M.; music afternoon and evening. Persons coming to New York and going away without visiting the Institute will miss one of the most useful and instructiv places of resort in the city. We trust the time is not far distant when prejudice shall yield to popular opinion and the fair be opened Sundays for the benefit of the mechanics, the real authors of the industrial works, benefiting the Institute to detriment of the rum-shops.

GEO. M. DAVENPORT.

How to Be Saved.

My friends, I wish to warn you who are developing your brains, cultivating your intellects, extending your knowledge of nature and of history, and increasing your logical and critical faculties, that you are on the broad road the terminus of which is h—h—sheol. Think over the names of the really intellectual men and women of our own time, and notice how few of them hav given any satisfactory evidence of being saved, and then stand by the gallows and see how few murderers answer before human tribunals for their crimes and are not "jerked to Jesus," and you will then understand where you are going.

Only a short time ago the church captured 117 converts in Joliet prison. Do you think they will ever catch one out of the American Association for the Advancement of Science? No, my friends, there is no intellectual road to heaven. Moody tells the preachers to emphasize the statement that "unbelief is the greatest sin." Will you follow Socrates or Christ? Socrates said, "The wise are doubtful;" Christ said, "He that believeth not shall be damned." Christ also thanked his father that he had hid this blessed religion from the wise and prudent and revealed it unto babes.

Paul said, "It pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe." He also said that he had determined to know nothing but Jesus Christ, and him crucified. Apparently in consequence of this resolution, he was constrained to say, "I speak as a fool." He also included the other preachers with himself, and remarked of the whole lot, "We are fools for Christ's sake." Fools, you know, will hav lucid moments. It was in some of these that he made the above remarks, and we are happy to agree with them.

Nebuchadnezzar prepared himself for a believer by subsisting upon grass like an ox (donkey?) for seven years. Sam Small, according to his own statement, reported in the Inter-Ocean, prepared himself for conversion and subsequent preaching by keeping drunk so long that his friends all thought he was going raving crazy, and then going to hear Sam Jones preach.

I once knew a man in Fairbury, Neb., who was a skeptic. There was a great revival there, and he was captured among the rest. I had never observed a phenomenon of that kind, and was much interested to see how he would get into the church. I followed him into the inquiry-meeting, and when his turn came he arose and said: "My friends, you must be patient with me. It seems hard to drive reason from her throne." I could not accompany that young man any farther on his way to heaven, and so sorrowfully left him. If he is still on the way wearing the easy yoke and bearing the light burden, which Brother Heston has so graphically pictured, I know not.

In the Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times for Oct. 8, 1886, is this item, among others, about evangelistic meetings in Scotland: "The Rev. Mr. Edgar said: 'There was an awakened man in our meeting last night. I think I never saw one so truly earnest to be saved. I was down among the people in the after-meeting when he said, "Will you speak to me for a moment?" "By all means," I said, and led him to another room. Putting his hands over his breast as if in terrible pain, and staring at me with large, wild-looking eyes, he exclaimed, "I think I shall go mad!" I answered, "Be seated, my friend. Do you want to be saved?" I opened my Bible and read John iii, 16. Still staring at me with those wild eyes he inquired, "Is it only trusting?" That man's fearful apprehension ceased as soon as he found peace through simple faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.'"

That kind of treatment is like that of the physician who admitted that he could not cure the disease which afflicted his patient, but he could giv him something that would make him hav fits, and he was death on fits.

Judge Black, in reply to Ingersoll, said: "It is universally agreed that children too young to understand it do not need to believe it. And this exemption extends to adults who hav never seen the evidence, or who from weakness of intellect are incapable of weighing it. Lunatics and idiots are not in the least danger."

The moment you see the faintest gleam of intellect you witness infinit danger. The only ones who hav a dead sure thing on salvation are the absolutely idiotic—the totally imbecil. God, in his infinit resources and wisdom, could only devise a sure means of saving the souls of those who did not, while on earth, exhibit the slightest indications of having any. St. Augustine, you recollect, preached to a nation of men and womeu without heads. Moody and Sam Jones do the same.

So, my intellectual friends who think yourselvs so smart now, because you can overwhelm all the saints and preachers with facts and arguments, how will you feel when you see Barnum's "what-is-it?" in Abraham's bosom and yourself thrust out? In that great day you will not be able to say that Brother Moody and I did not duly notify you that you were on the wrong road. D. PRIESTLEY.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

Gems of Thought.

IT is a stupid man that refuses to believe the evidence of his senses, it is an unreasonable man who in forming his belief will throw good evidence aside, and that man is equally stupid and unreasonable who will found a fixed belief on no evidence at all.—D. M. Bennett.

"THE prince hath every great and generous quality, with, perhaps, a weakness for the sex, which belongs to his family, and hath been known in scores of popular sovereigns from King David downwards." "My lord, my lord!" breaks out Lady Esmond, "the levity with which you speak of such conduct toward our sex shocks me, and what you call weakness I call deplorable sin." "Sin it is, my dear creature," says his lordship, Bishop Atterbury, with a shrug, "but consider what a sinner King Solomon was, and in spite of a thousand wives, too." "Enough of this, my lord," says Lady Castlewood, with a fine blush, and walked out of the room very stately.—Thackeray's Henry Esmond.

AMONG the letters of introduction with which Milton provided himself, when about to visit Italy, one was from the aged Sir Henry Walton, provost of Eton, in Milton's immediate neighborhood. Sir Henry, who had lived a long time in Italy, impressed upon his young friend the importance of discretion on the point of religion, and told him the story which he always told to travelers who asked his advice: "At Siena I was tabled in the house of one Albert Scipioni, an old Roman courtier in dangerous times. . . . At my departure from Rome I had won confidence enough to beg his advice how I might carry myself securely there, without offense to others, or of mine own conscience. 'Signor Arrigo mio,' says he, 'pensieri strotti ed il visu sciatto' (thoughts close, countenance open), will go safely over the whole world."—Mark Pattison's Milton.

KNOWLEDGE can neither be adequately cultivated nor adequately enjoyed by a few, and, although the conditions of our existence on earth may be such as to preclude an abundant supply of the physical necessities of all who may be born, there is no such law of nature in force against that of intellectual and moral wants. Knowledge is not like food, destroyed by use, but rather augmented and perfected. It acquires, not perhaps a greater certainty, but, at least, a confirmed authority, and a probable duration by universal assent, and there is no body of knowledge so complete but that it may acquire accession, or so free from error but that it may receive correction in passing through the minds of millions.—Sir John Herschel.

THAT which touches morality touches the heart of society; a high and pure morality is the life-blood of humanity; mistakes in belief are inevitable, and are of little moment; mistakes in life destroy happiness, and their destructiv consequences spread far and wide.—Mrs. Annie Besant's True Basis of Morality.

LINES ON EMERSON.

Let us honor our friend indeed
As the singer of the May,
For he bade New England's creed
To a sunnier faith giv way.

His words were the flood of life and light
Which hav burst that icy chain,
And he walked himself in the sunshine bright
That never will cease to reign.

The summer of thought draws near,
Bringing truth hitherto unknown,
But the herald of spring is dear,
And the might of his work we own.

—F. M. H.

WHATEVER may be the nature of the deity, and whether there be a future life or not, the great moral laws can be in no way changed. God is a purely scientific question. Whether he be personal of impersonal, definable or undefinable, our duties and responsibilities remain the same.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

VAIN hope to make men happy by politics! You cannot drill a regiment of knaves into a regiment of honest men, enregiment and organize them as cunningly as you will. Giv us the honest men, and the well-ordered regiment comes of itself Reform one man—reform thy own inner man; it is more than scheming out reforms for a nation.—Carlyle.

DECEMBER 4, 1822.—This is my birthday. I am now seven and twenty years of age. What an unprofitable lout I am! What hav I done in this world to make good my place in it, or reward those in it that had the trouble of my up-bringing? Great part of an ordinary lifetime is gone by, and here am I, poor trifler, still sojourning in Meshech, still doing nothing in the tents of Kedar. May the great father of all giv me strength to do better in time remaining, to be of service in the good cause in my day and generation, and having finished the work which was given me to do, to lie down and sleep in peace and purity in the hope of a happy rising.—Carlyle's Letters.

Odds and Ends.

YOUNG man (driving with young girl): "I say, farmer, how can I get back to the village the quickest way?" Farmer: "Well, you might run your horse."

THE Medical Record discusses the question: "How to Sleep," and givs a long, scientific formula for inducing sleep. What's the matter with going to church?

GEORGE WASHINGTON'S Bible is owned in Philadelphia. It is said that it does'nt look as if it had been used at all. It probably hasn't since George died. A Bible will last a long time in Philadelphia.

THE pope has issued a decree forbidding the cremation of Catholics. His holiness don't believe in running more than one post mortem furnace. If we could all be sure that he was equally efficacious in holding back fuel for the other and better known retort, what a corner on Christians the Vatican would hav, to be sure!—Life.

DOBSON (who has come hither to horsewhip the editor, but is somewhat appalled at his size): "Are you the editor that wrote the article about J. Thomas Dobson?" Editor: "Yes." Dobson: "Well—er—hum. Why—here's a horsewhip I found on your pavement. I thought perhaps it belonged to you."

WE were at a meeting the other day in which one of the congregation could not restrain his feelings, but shouted so vehemently that for a while the preacher had to suspend his remarks. But in five minutes thereafter a collection was made preceded by an appeal, and with that came a total cessation of the shouting.—Richmond Religious Herald.

"MAMMA," said Bobby, looking up from his Sabbath-school lesson, "I'm sorry for Adam and Eve, ain't you?" "Why, my son?" asked the mother. "Because they didn't hav anything but just a fig leaf to wear," he replied, thoughtfully. "But it was warm in Eden, and perhaps they did not want warm clothes like you and me," she explained. "Yes, but just think, the catechism says the earth was made to bring forth thistles."

ELDERLY gentleman (from way back, on his first visit to New York): "What an immense throng are gathered at the entrance of yonder church! how excitedly they struggle for admission to the sacred edifice! Evidently a revival of unprecedented dimensions is in progress." Unregenerate gamin (scornfully): "Naw, dat ain't no revival. Dis is der last night of der big church fair, an' dey're goin' ter raffle fer der grand pianny in half an' hour."

REMARKS BY A FASHIONABLE CLERGYMAN.

I am the pastor (pronounce, if you please, pahstor) of an uptown church—in fact, the church of the Investigation. What do we investigate? Oh, dear me, nothing whatever, of course—the idea's quite absurd, you know. We are very exclusiv, as you are probably aware. We hav some of the best people, the very best, don't you know, among us, and it would be exceedingly impolitic to admit the riff-raff—quite out of the question, don't you see? My salary is seven thousand a year only, and free house rent, and I think you will admit that I earn it when I tell you that it sometimes takes me all Saturday afternoon to prepare my sermons for the following day. Yes, really. Then I hav the Wednesday evening prayer-meeting to attend, and I make it a point of duty to visit all my parishioners—that is, all who hav any social position to speak of, don't you know—regularly, so you see I am a very hard worked man. I am so exhausted Mondays—oh, you can't think! quite prostrated, I assure you. We hav frequent services of song on Sabbath evenings, and on these occasions I preach only a ten-minute sermon. This is quite a relief to me.

We used to hav an expensiv choir—indeed my people paid at one time four thousand a year for music. I did not approve of this extravagance—I could not see my way clear to do so. I reasoned with my dear people. I pointed out to them that far more would be accomplished toward the healing of the nations if a two thousand dollar choir were engaged, and the remainder of the appropriation added to my salary. This was done, of course. Madame Squalki, the soprano, sang for us a few weeks. It was at the time that I was delivering my famous series of discourses on "Lessons From the Life of the Whale that Swallowed Jonah;" you no doubt remember the sermons, they created a great deal of attention then, don't you know, and hav since been published in neat pamphlet form at forty cents a copy. The church was crowded, of course, and Madam Squalki—I know you'll laugh when I tell you, the idea's so exquisitly absurd—that woman was actually overheard to express the opinion that she drew the immense congregations. Ridiculous, was it not? Of course I was annoyed, frightfully annoyed, when I hear this, and I insisted that she be discharged at once, which was done.

The next Sabbath the church was nearly empty; a most remarkable coincidence, was it not? But it vexed me, for I knew what that malicious woman would say. Last June my nerves were in such a state that I was really alarmed—all from overwork, you know. I decided to go to Europe. My people gave me a purse containing a thousand dollars, five dressing cases, nine smoking jackets, and twenty-six pairs of slippers. So nice in them, was it not? I arrived home only a fortnight ago, and last week I received a call from a church in Chicago which offers me ten thousand a year. I hav considered the matter long and prayfully, and hav been driven to the irresistible conclusion that the claims of this new field of labor cannot be ignored, so I shall notify my people here that I am going.

LATER.—I hav just received another letter from Chicago, and find that the good brother who wrote me last week put down one cipher two many in specifying the salary. It is only one thousand. Upon second thoughts I hav concluded to remain here.—Tid-Bits.

THE TEACHINGS OF THE BIBLE PRACTICALLY APPLIED.

Notes and Clippings.

When General Corse, the recently appointed postmaster at Boston, was beleaguered in the city of Altoona, General Sherman signaled to him, "Hold the fort, I am coming." From this dispatch comes the "Hold the Fort" hymn. But somehow or other General Corse's reply seems to hav been omitted from the sacred verse. What he signaled back was this: "I am minus an ear and part of a jaw, but we can lick all hell yet." The omission is probably a clerical error, and the hymn should be at once revised.

A clergyman writes to the Boston Advertiser that he recently preached in one of the oldest churches in the "old" city of London. As he entered the porch, he was met by a rotund and dignified beadle, who led him to the vestry-room, and, pointing to two decanters, said, "Will you take sherry or port, sir?" The parson smiled at, not with, the beadle, who then explained that about three hundred years ago a good woman of the parish, dying, left a certain sum for the purchase "of wine and sweet cakes for the clergy," and since that time wine and cakes hav been regularly supplied at each service.

The news that the ladies hav carried off three-fourths of the honors in the junior class of Colby University, and that to giv the boys any kind of a showing two English parts hav been assigned instead of one as usual—and this, in connection with the fact that there are but six young ladies in the class—is received with delight by some people who hav not forgotten when an argument used against the admission of ladies into the colleges was that they had not sufficient intellect to master the intricacies of Latin and Greek, or else that their minds were too largely taken up with such frivolities as dress and society.—Lewiston (Me.) Journal.

In 1822 the Institute of the Propaganda was established in Rome, and since that time 220,000,000 lire hav been expended in its work, resulting in the establishment of 270 new bishoprics and prefectures. In 1822 there were only 12 Roman Catholic bishops in Asia—namely, 6 in China and 6 in India. Now, India, with Ceylon, has 26 archbishops and 1,200 priests, and in Farther India, China, and Japan, 1,500,000 Catholics are under the spiritual care of 50 apostolic vicars and 1,400 missionaries. Before 1822 there was no bishopric on the whole continent of Africa. Now we find there are 2 archbishops, 12 bishops, 17 vicars, and 16 prefects. The strongest growth is reported from the American continent. In British America, where 63 years ago there were but 2 bishops, are now reported 30 bishops, 2,000 priests, and 2,000,000 Catholics. Australia has 23 bishoprics.

The Travelers' Magazine tells this story: It was on the Maine Central road, between Augusta and Bangor. A well-dressed gentleman came into the smoker and asked: "Is there a gentleman from Bangor in this car?" "Chestnut!" yelled a young man who was engaged in a game of poker, dollar ante. "Sir," said the well-dressed gentleman, "I simply asked a civil question, and I hoped for a civil answer." "Civil nothing!" said the poker player. "If I'd said I was from Bangor, then you'd hav said, 'Kindly oblige me with the loan of your corkscrew,' and then everybody would hav laughed. That racket is bald-headed and moth-eaten down here—try it on some other road." "Sir, you do me an injustice. I simply wished to know if the secretary of the Bangor Young Men's Christian Association is in town at the present time." "I'll take it all back—accept my apologies—and this bottle. I'm the secretary of the Bangor Y. M. C. A., very much at your service. Sit down till I scoop in this jack-pot, and I'll see what I can do for you."

There is a very prominent business man over on State street, says the Chicago Mail, who always wears a very demure expression of countenance, although he is fond of a joke. One day he walked into Charley Barnes's hat store, and soberly inquired whether the house made discounts to pastors. Mr. Barnes himself was on hand to assure him that they did, and would allow him the usual twenty per cent off. The solemn man then said he would like a becoming hat. Several were shown to him, and after a good deal of thought and inquiry he finally selected one marked five dollars, which Mr. Barnes said he would sell him for four dollars. The solemn man put it on and contemplated himself for some time in the mirror. Was the hat becoming to a man in his profession? Mr. Barnes was confident it was. Would his congregation be likely to take any exception to it? Mr. Barnes was confident they could not. Then the solemn man looked at himself some more, and, after making another inquiry as to whether it would be sure to please his congregation, produced his four dollars. Then he started out. At the door he paused and inquired again: "They can't find any fault with it, can they?" "Most certainly not," said Mr. Barnes, confidently. "Because, if they do," said the solemn man, as his hand was upon the door latch, "they can go to h—l."

At an island on the coast of Maine, which is much resorted to, there is an esteemed local clergyman, who is known to the summer residents as the "hen minister." This is by reason of the habit of telling a certain story which queerly illustrates the idea of faith: "I preached a sermon one Sunday," the good minister will say, "on the doctrin of faith, in which I taught my hearers the good Christian doctrin that all things may be brought about by faith, instructing them that faith is the evidence of things not seen, the substance of things hoped for. There was a farmer's wife in the congregation who was greatly edified by the sermon, and came to me and told me that she now understood just what faith was. Next Sunday morning I overtook her on the way to church. 'See here, parson,' says she, 'I don't think much of your teachin' about faith.' 'Why not?' I asked. 'Why,' says she, 'the other day I heard my speckled hen a-cacklin' like all to pay. Now,' says I, 'here is a chance to show what faith is. That speckled hen's egg is the evidence of things not seen; the substance of things hoped for. I hav faith that she's laid an egg, and I'm sure that when I'll go out to the shed I'll find it. So I goes out and looks for it, and there wasn't any egg there, and that speckled hen hadn't laid any. Now, what's your faith good for, I'd like to know?' And then," the minister will say, "I told her what was the matter with her faith. 'It was meant for a rebuke to you that you didn't find any egg there,' said I. 'You'd ought to hav trusted in God, and not in the hen!'"

Communications.

The Church and its Influence.

This direful condition of the people is directly chargeable to Christian teaching, with all the ignorance and bestiality of the Middle Ages. A faithful portrayal of all the sickness and sorrows, the starvation and suffering, superinduced by the same teaching, would form one of the blackest pages ever written in the book of history. While science was experimenting in the laboratory, or studying the language of the rocks, or ascertaining the length of a degree on the earth, or watching with tireless zeal the motion of the heavenly bodies, the church was on bended knees, or engaged in war, or selling indulgences, or building shrines, or exhibiting holy relics, or burning heretics.

The voice of science is that every effort should result in the amelioration of the race; that steam, electricity, earth, air, and ocean should be made to contribute to the happiness of man.

The spirit of the church is that this life is of little consequence. No matter how much we suffer here if we can ultimately reach heaven,

> Where sickness, sorrow, pain, and death
> Are felt and known no more.

The world is but a "desert," and regardless of all consequences in this life we should constantly keep our thoughts on heaven.

> I am but a stranger here,
> Heaven is my home;
> Earth is a desert drear,
> Heaven is my home.
> Danger and sorrow stand
> Round me on every hand,
> Heaven is my fatherland,
> Heaven is my home.

Such is the spirit of the church. Our thanks are due to science and not to the church that the earth is not a "desert" to-day. Anciently, the priesthood was the repository of knowledge. They not only taught religion, but so much of science, law, and medicin as they had learned and were willing to hav the people know.

Little was known about disease, and everything of a miraculous character was believed to be possible. Everything not understood was believed to hav some supernatural power behind it.

Spells and charms were at a premium. A spell or charm which would ward off some particular disease could be sold at a high price. Epilepsy, St. Vitus's dance, nervous affections, and even violent attacks of colic were believed to be the work of demons. Hence a formula for casting out demons could be sold at a high price. A man who had power to cast out devils was regarded as the "big Indian" of the tribe.

Is it any wonder that such people believed in celestial communication, immaculate conceptions, inspired men, demons and angels, virgins and saviors, resurrections and ascensions?

Men of such belief hav proved themselvs to be the worst enemies of mental and political freedom. They hav tortured and murdered some of the world's bravest and noblest men. Men who hav tried to bring about better conditions and render life a little more agreeable hav been the special objects upon which the church has vented its fury.

All this is not strange. Stop for a moment and think what it is to be a Christian and to believe as a Christian! The pursuit of earthly happiness is a crime. Sorrow and misery are the only passports to heaven.

Death is the only escape from the bondage of life. Joy is to be banished from the earth in order to secure heaven and a harp. Our natural desires are all wrong. What we most loathe we are to strive for. What will afford us delight we must shun as we would the brimstone regions of the nether world. Is it any wonder that such teaching culminated in the midnight of the Middle Ages?

Occasionally one will meet a minister who will say that he does not believe in "long-faced religion;" that Christians ought to be the most joyous and happy of any mortals on the earth. But this is not Christianity. It is just what Liberals are trying to get into the heads of Christians.

Hear the teaching of real Christians whose lead the people hav been following for the last eighteen hundred years:

"If any man will come after me let him deny himself and take up his cross." Deny himself of what? Why, of all pleasure and everything which makes life agreeable or desirable, and wear a Puritan face as long as a stove-pipe. What is it to take up your cross? Why, to go down on your knees in tears and whine like a spaniel, and afflict yourself till life becomes a burden, and then get up in meeting and lie before the world by telling how much you enjoy your afflictions.

"Be afflicted and mourn and weep. Let your laughter be turned to mourning and your joy to heaviness. Woe unto you that laugh."

This is Christ's teaching. If any teach that Christians ought to be happy and filled with joy, he does not teach New Testament doctrin. Everyone is to weep and be afflicted, Everything of a vivacious nature is to be turned to leaden heaviness. The world is to be draped in mourning—no joy, no smiles. Everybody dressed in black—all dead. "Life is a great funeral and all the world a graveyard."

This is the New Testament idea of life. If Christians hav got light enough from the Liberals so that their religious text-book begins to be distasteful to them, let them revise it or get up a new one altogether. If the time ever comes that all men fully believe in the doctrins of the New Testament, and act from their belief, earth will be transformed into a great lair, and all the inhabitants into tigers. Whenever a man fully believes that heaven depends upon faith and belief, and that hell is the reward of unbelief, he becomes a persecuting monster.

In his judgment it would be a thousand times better for an Infidel to be burnt alive than to take the chances of his unsettling the faith of others. The mild punishment of being roasted at the stake bears no relations to that eternal roast, where the smoke of their torments ascendeth up forever and ever.

Better to put an Infidel out of the way than to hav the salvation of a single soul jeopardized by his teaching. This is Christian philosophy, and it has murdered more than three millions of human beings. All the relentless butchers of the Inquisition believed in this philosophy.

Oswald says: "At the end of the thirteenth century the enemies of nature (the Christians) had reached the zenith of their power, and at that time it may be said that, without a single exception, the countries of Christian Europe were worse governed, more ignorant, more superstitious, poorer, and unhappier than the worst-governed province of pagan Rome. Whichever way the eye might be turned was darkness, slavery, and misery; bigoted tyrants and brutalized serfs; neglected fields and blighted cities; perverted sciences and paralyzed industries; hordes of self-torturing maniacs, frenzying the people with their threats and prophecies; international manhunts, religious massacres, witchcraft riots, and a merciless war waged against every form of mental and social independence; the lower classes treated no better than beasts of burden, their habitations more like dens than houses, living on black bread, roots, and herbs."

Such was the condition of France when the church owned two-thirds of the best lands. And yet half of the ministers prate about the French Revolution, and charge to Infidelity all the ruin and bloodshed.

The Christian religion, carried out in its true spirit, will produce these results every time and everywhere. It is a system of ignorance, poverty, and sorrow, and not of intelligence, prosperity, and joy.

In proof of this it may be stated that while Christianity was at its best, and bore full sway in Europe, learning lay dead for more than a thousand years.

About the beginning of the tenth century there were very few men in Rome itself who were men of letters. Not one priest in a hundred in Spain could address a common letter to another. Every philosopher and reformer had a lifelong struggle with despots and bigots. The worst tyranny that has ever oppressed the children of men has been perpetrated by Christians and in the name of the Christians' God.

To show the power and the influence of the church over the times and the minds of men, it is only necessary to mention that Blackstone, in his great work entitled, "Commentaries on the Laws of England," approves of confiscations and penalties of and upon those who spoke in language derogatory to the Book of Common Prayer.

Dr. Priestley, with characteristic boldness, at once attacked the barbarous position, and made the great commentator promis to leave out the objectionable passages from future editions of his work.

In the day of Blackstone (and he died only a little over a hundred years ago), no man could hold a civil office in England who had not received the sacrament and subscribed to the "Thirty-Nine Articles." For a man to preach who did not subscribe to these articles involved heavy fines and a long term of imprisonment. Every student of Oxford was compelled to subscribe to the articles of the church before he could enter the institution.

These positions Dr. Priestley also attacked with the boldness of a lion, and showed conclusivly that a man's religious belief should not cut him off from any of his civil rights.

It should be remembered that Dr. Priestley was one of the most noted chemists and scientists of his day, and that few men rendered greater or more lasting services to the world than he did. And how did the church reward this great man for his invaluable services?

A Christian mob surrounded his house and set it on fire. His library, apparatus, with all his valuable manuscripts—in short, the valuable scientific and literary accumulations of a lifetime—perished in the devouring flames. He and his family were compelled to flee for their lives, and only escaped death through the concealment of friends. Priestley witnessed from a concealed position the destruction of his house and valuable effects, and succeeded in escaping under an assumed name.

To show the loving kindness of those who hav received a gospel education, and the feeling which a lot of pious cranks manifested toward this great scientist and reformer, at a dinner of clergymen, one of the monkey-faced embassadors from God's throne declared that if "Dr. Priestley were mounted on a pile of his own works, he would be ready to set fire to the pile and burn him alive." The speaker was applauded without a dissenting voice; all laughed heartily and thought it would be a "very brilliant process for getting away with an enemy of God."

Another pious scullion in a newspaper article declared that he "would like to see Dr. Priestley begging bread through the streets and ending his days in the poorhouse without a friend to close his eyes." So fare the great and the good in the hands of the church.

Think of squeezing the head of a young man in a theological institution of learning as a Flathead mother does the head of her child, loading him with creeds and dead-weights, putting on curbs, and incasing him in an iron jacket, and then teaching him that men are too vile to liv who teach a better way! Is it any wonder that men are converted into human tigers in such institutions? Better to let a young man take his chance in the universal school of nature.

May I cherish the hope that these facts, told in a broken way as they hav been, will be remembered by the young Liberals of the land, and when a whining hypocrit in black coat and white choker stands up in the pulpit and claims that the church has always been the promoter of science and reform, that they will call him to an account and let him know that he cannot stand up before the world, even in the "coward's castle," and utter these stale, moldy lies without being rebuked? The young men who take this course will render far greater service to coming generations than those who enter theological schools and never rise above immaculate conceptions, resurrections, and ascensions, which hav only served to muddle the minds of men for many centuries. The people will never rise above this holy nonsense until they learn the important fact that the Gods hav never been engaged in writing books.

Suppose, in old mythological times, some person or persons had been impressed with the idea that he or they ought to write out the will of the gods. Then, after a time, suppose these writings should be regarded as inspired, and become of divine authority.

As men became more enlightened and began to study the laws of matter and motion, the causes of wind and tide and other phenomena in nature would be sought for. What produces the changes of the moon? And why at times is her face entirely obscured? Why is the sun sometimes shrouded in darkness? What causes the succession of day and night, the changes of the seasons, etc.? Answers to these and a hundred other kindred questions would be sought for by those whose keen eye had been turned toward scientific subjects.

As these causes came to be understood, the gods which were supposed to be the moving causes would be brought into discredit, and a conflict between the believers in these gods and sacred writings and the scientists would be the result.

Now, it requires no great mental keenness to see how natural it would be for the adherents to that religion to oppose every scientific discovery. To them everything must be accounted for by the gods, and sanctioned by their sacred writings. Of course every scientist would be a heretic and incur the displeasure of the gods, and would consequently be a bad man.

Undoubtedly there would be terrible penalties attached to the disrespectful mention of or allusion to the gods, or for violations of the sacred writings. Hence these religionists would persecute the scientists, because they would think they were carrying out the will of their gods in so doing.

If the punishments in their sacred writings were like some of those meted out in the Old Testament, the devotees would be barbaric in their persecutions, and after inflicting the most dreadful penalties which their ingenuity could invent, they would hand over the heretic to old Pluto to be further dealt with in the infernal regions.

All will see that Pluto is the right-hand man in carrying out the will of the gods. In this comparison I think I hav succeeded in showing the reason why nearly every scientific discovery has met with opposition from the church, and why the Christian religion has acted as a clog to human progress.

With all the light of the nineteenth century, men still believe in the ghosts, bugaboos, impossibilities, and absurdities of two thousand years ago. This is so only because these absurd notions were written down in a book when men believed them possible. This book is regarded as the word of God, and these consequences must follow as long as men are taught to believe in God-written books.

Draper says: "Immaculate conceptions and celestial descents were so currently received in those days that whoever had greatly distinguished himself in the affairs of men was thought to be of supernatural lineage."

Romulus, the founder of Rome, is said to hav owed his existence to the accidental meeting of the god Mars and the virgin Rhea-Sylvia. For hundreds of years this was implicitly believed.

The legend that the mother of Plato, a pure virgin, conceived through the influence of Apollo, and that the god had declared to the future husband the parentage of the child, was current for hundreds of years in Egypt.

This shows that if the people are sufficiently ignorant and superstitious, women can giv birth to young gods as well as young children.

In our enlightened age it is almost impossible to understand the authority with which the commands and decrees of Alexander the Great came to the people of Syria and Eygpt when he styled himself "King Alexander, the son of Jupiter Ammon." The ignorance of the people makes anything possible with the gods.

Step by step, as man advances, some new error of the church is brought to light. She stands before the world with the broad claim that wherever Christianity is found, there is found the highest type of civilization, and that to it we are indebted for every scientific discovery, and for every improvement of the age. These high claims are known to be hypocritically false, and ere long, instead of influencing the masses in her favor by such claims, she will bring down upon her head the scorn and contempt of all honest-minded men and women. Wilfred Hall admits in a short paragraph that there has been a terrible conflict between science and religion, and that in this conflict religion has been driven to the wall. Now he proposes to recast the sciences so as to giv to Christianity a new lease of life. He virtually admits that it is impossible to harmonize the Christian religion with science as now taught and understood, and declares before the world that unless his new theory of science is adopted, the old hag of superstition is dead, and every attempt to resuscitate her will only be like the unmethodical kicking of a corpse when a galvanic battery is applied. Well, one day we expect to hear that the Christian religion is quietly sleeping in its grave with other old mythological notions, and that Wilfred Hall, with his new theory of science, has taken hold of his own boot-straps, and lifted himself over the fence out of sight. In the campaigns of Alexander astronomical records of Chaldaic origin were found more than a thousand years old. This shows that there were greater scientific attainments two thousand years before Christ than one thousand years after. A determination to know nothing but "Christ and him crucified" has never turned the vigilant eye of the astronomer toward the heavenly bodies. During the centuries when there was the greatest craze over the Christian religion there was the least done to advance science.

Spirit Photography.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mr. Robinson complains that the report of the committee did not do Mr. Keeler justice. I am so far inclined to agree with him that I will write another report individually, which shall do him justice:

INDIVIDUAL REPORT OF THE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. Robinson issued a challenge in which he proposed to demonstrate to a committee the genuinness of the spirit photographs produced upon the negativs taken by Mr. Keeler. For three weeks after Mr. Keeler had been notified that the committee were ready to proceed, he hesitated, and then declined to proceed without imposing restrictions upon the investigation. With manifest reluctance, these conditions were so far modified that it was possible to proceed; and the first meeting was held on June 20th. We were not invited to impose tests or to examin the premises. Two hours were consumed in taking six negativs, upon one of which there appeared a face such as could evidently hav been produced by putting a transparent positiv in the plate-holder at the time of the exposure. At the second session, on June 23d, lasting two hours, six more negativs were taken, no one of which bore a spirit face. At the third session, on June 26th, which we were informed would be the last in consequence of Mr. Keeler's leaving the city, we insisted upon proposing tests. During the two hours which these tests consumed, six more negativs were taken, one so-called spirit face appearing upon a plate when I had interrupted my tests in order to giv visitors an opportunity to see a spirit photograph taken, and no result appearing upon any one of the other five plates. Had any extraneous face appeared upon any one of those five plates, it would hav either demonstrated Mr. Keeler beyond dispute to be a fraud, or would hav been an exceedingly strong evidence of the reality of spirit photographs. This ended the investigation proper. Omitting the plate at the last session where I had interrupted my tests, in the taking of seventeen negativs only one spirit face appeared to be produced, and that was before we had been invited to propose or did impose any tests whatever; in other words, before our investigation began. Although Mr. Keeler was in the city most of the time for several weeks, and although the committee formally proposed further investigation, no opportunity was afforded to us. We also examined various other negativs and prints, some taken in the presence of members of the committee after the session proper was closed, and others under conditions unknown to us. Inspection of those negativs and prints showed that, with one exception, every one of them could hav been taken either by previous printing or by simultaneous exposure; and we were satisfied that that exception was a photograph of a prepared tableau. I therefore individually report: 1. That Mr. Robinson failed to furnish us any evidence whatever of the existence of a spirit photograph; 2. That he furnished us abundant evidence of the fraudulent character of the so-called spirit photographs taken by Mr. Keeler.

HENRY M. PARKHURST.

While this is all that was necessary in my judgment, if we had been called upon merely to giv our own verdict, we decided in our report to giv Mr. Keeler the benefit of any possible doubt that even Mr. Robinson could hav or imagin, and to show every circumstance and to count for him every plate which could possibly be interpreted or misinterpreted in his favor. I do not find in Mr. Robinson's long letter any statement that any evidence was furnished us which we omitted or misrepresented, or indeed that any such evidence was furnished us at all as to justify a favorable report.

Having thus done justice to the results of the investigation, let me do justice to Mr. Robinson. Notwithstanding his charge of insincerity upon my part, and notwithstanding his flagrant misquotations from the committee's report, I believe him to be sincere; and this is not "sarcasm."

In order to reply most briefly to his letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 2d, I will classify the points and reply to them as far as possible in bulk:

1. As to the complaints of omission, it is enough to call attention to the fact that our report nearly covered two pages, in spite of every effort at condensation.

2. As to statements that I ought to hav suppressed certain matters, I hav only to deny his allegations of any agreement to suppress them. I do not deny that he expressed a wish that we should.

3. There was no provision in the challenge that we should attempt to prevent the production of fraudulent negativs. On the contrary, in my original letter I stated—and this shall be quoted correctly—"Critical watching would not be required." If Mr. Robinson understood jugglers' tricks a little better, he would hav seen that putting the plates "in the possession and charge of Dr. Leigh" would hav left the door wide open, unless Dr. Leigh himself put those plates into the plate-holder, put the plate-holder into the camera, and after exposure developed the plates himself. Even then it might be said that Dr. Leigh was in collusion with Mr. Keeler. My methods were such that if there had been a dozen or more persons present every one could be certain that all the others combined could not by collusion produce a fraudulent negativ without its being betrayed. My object was not to prevent fraudulent negativs, but to insure that a fraudulent negativ should betray itself.

4. Mr. Robinson makes the most of my attempting to catch Mr. Keeler in fraud by turning the plate, and by looking for a positiv. I was not insincere nor biased enough to induce me to suppress these facts although they were manifestly only known to myself. My turning the plate would not at all interfere with any genuin result, occupied but a few seconds, and might hav betrayed previous printing by inverting the position of the spirit face. And in looking for the positiv, my knowledge how the previous negativs had been produced did not show how that particular negativ was to be produced. If there had appeared upon that negativ a picture bearing the marks of simultaneous printing, it would hav been little credit to my acumen if I had been compelled to declare that I believed it to hav been printed from a positiv in the plate-holder, which, although I had taken the plate out of the plate-holder myself, I had been so careless as to overlook. If such a face had appeared upon that plate as the one which appeared at the first session, my search would hav been important evidence in favor of the genuinness of that negativ, for it would hav tended to show that, improbable as it is, the spirits did produce just such a negativ as we ascribed to simultaneous printing, or else that my careful search was not careful enough.

5. Mr. Robinson quotes, not very accurately, but sufficiently well, two of my remarks, which I will explain. I told him that if the face of one of my relativs should appear upon a plate I should not know that Mr. Keeler had not succeeded in obtaining a print somehow from which he could copy it. The "particular one" was a person who had never had but one picture taken, and I had a copy of that. The other remark was to the effect that if the intention was to giv Spiritualism a boom by an unaccepted challenge, it was a game of bluff, and that it should not rest in that way longer than I could help, but should be put upon a secure foundation if it would bear investigation.

6. There was no "intended sarcasm" in the wish to aid the spirits in establishing the verity of the photographs if the spirits could make them, but it was a misquotation to say that we wished to aid them in producing the results. There are so many misstatements and misquotations with regard to minor matters that I will not take up the space to refer to them. I will only call attention to one misquotation so flagrant that if I were not personally acquainted with Mr. Robinson I should consider it an intentional falsification. He says the committee chose to rely "entirely upon an examination of the negativs," whereas what the committee said was (see IV. at the end of the report), "We were therefore obliged to rely mainly upon an examination of the nine negativs themselvs for internal evidence of their origin." We had just given the reasons why we could not hav our choice; we did not rely entirely, but mainly, upon this sort of evidence, and we referred to negativs already taken, and not to negativs to be taken.

7. Mr. Robinson says the committee attempted to pass judgment upon the negativs as experts. That is his word and not ours, and he proceeds to show the unreliability of the testimony of experts paid to testify upon a particular side. Let us compare the position of the committee with that of Mr. Robinson himself. The committee thought they could judge from the negativs themselvs how they might hav been produced. We selected the tableau picture as "bearing characteristics entirely different" from all the others. Mr. Robinson admits that that picture was taken "under very different conditions" from the others, showing that in that instance, at least, the committee did form a correct judgment of the manner in which a negativ was taken from an examination of the negativ itself. Now, the committee were free to report strictly according to the evidence; he had placed himself in advance as the advocate of one side. The committee were practica ly acquainted with photography; he knows nothing about it practically, and it would hardly be an exaggeration to add, theoretically. The committee gave their judgment upon the "cane picture," and upon that "which showed the slide partially drawn," not only upon the points stated in the report, but upon everything which they could see on the negativs. Mr. Robinson states circumstances which the committee did not enumerate—not having the negativs before me I cannot vouch for their accuracy—and some of these additional circumstances which he refers to as contradicting our opinion, tend, to a practical photographer, to demonstrate the correctness of our opinion. It is for the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to judge for themselvs which is most likely to be reliable, the opinion of three practical photographers, having no interest to bias them, or the opinion of Mr. Robinson unsupported by experience, and in his position with reference to this investigation.

HENRY M. PARKHURST.

Brooklyn, Oct. 7, 1886.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In the matter of Mr. Keeler's spirit photography, I beg to say a word in defense of my old friend Henry M. Parkhurst. The charge made against him of insincerity and injustice in that investigation I most indignantly resent. I was Mr. Parkhurst's first assistant in reporting the debates of the United States Senate from 1848 to 1854. For many years thereafter we worked together, some of the time as partners, occupying the same office in New York, and for a time our families lived in the same house. During a period of twenty years, I think no man knew him more intimately than I did; and I can truly say that I hav known few men so just and conscientious as he. In the early days of Spiritualism, he and I tested the phenomena and accepted the spirit theory. In 1867 he and I, together with Dr. Edwin Leigh and the late Wm. Blair Lord, my partner, prepared a test of independent clairvoyance to be submitted by Mr. Parkhurst to the sleepless girl in Brooklyn. She lived nearly opposit Mr. Parkhurst's house, and all the rest of us had been permitted to see her, through the influence of Mr. Parkhurst and family, who were her most frequent and welcome visitors. An accident prevented the use of that test; but Messrs. Parkhurst and Leigh prepared another similar one, which was submitted to the sleepless, speechless, and sightless girl. The result was written out June 3, 1867, and signed by Mr. Parkhurst. It concludes as follows:

> I regard the proof as complete that she read the printed slip, so far as stated above, absolutely independent of all human knowledge of its contents.

This report will be found printed in the New York Herald, Nov. 30, 1878, together with a further statement written April 24, 1869, and a corroborativ attestation by Dr. Edwin Leigh. Surely nothing could be more sincere and just than that report. And now, having read his recent report on spirit photographs, and the foggy animadversions upon it by Mr. R. M. Robinson, I am justly indignant at the imputations to Mr. Parkhurst of insincerity and a lack of good faith. If he entered upon the investigation with a suspicion of fraud, it was a just suspicion. In 1863 I saw some of the first specimens of spirit photography in the office of the Herald of Progress, New York. They were alleged to be produced through the mediumship of Mr. Mumler, of Boston. At first I was astonished, but on close inspection I discovered internal evidence of fraud, and wrote an exposure for the Herald of Progress. From that time to this, I hav suspected the genuinness of all spirit photography.

Call for the Tenth Annual Congress.

To the Auxiliary Secular Unions and to all Citizens of the United States and Canadas who support the Nine Demands of Liberalism:

You are invited to attend the Tenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, to be held in New York city, at Chickering Hall, Fifth avenue and 18th street, on November 11th, 12th, and 13th, and also on Sunday evening, the 14th, a lecture by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, which concludes the Congress.

Pursuant to a vote of the last Congress, notice is hereby given that the following amendments to the constitution of the Union will be acted upon: 1. To reduce the fee for life-membership from $25 to $10. 2. Or, on payment of $10 by applicant for membership, to authorize the secretary to issue ten-year membership certificates, with all the privileges of life-membership during that time. 3. Whenever a man or woman has taken out annual membership certificates for three or five consecutiv years, such person thereafter on payment of annual-membership fee to possess the privilege of life-membership.

The Congress will also be called upon to consider measures for carrying on the work of Freethought, and securing the adoption of such laws by the various state governments and by the national government, as shall make the United States thoroughly Secular, and the repeal of all laws now on the statute-books which conflict with the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

Local auxiliary Unions are entitled by the Union constitution to five representativs in the Congress—the president and secretary and three delegates. All charter-members and life-members, all vice-presidents, all chairmen of state executiv committees, are entitled to seats and votes in the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats but not votes, except by permission of the Congress.

It is hoped that every auxiliary Union will send a full delegation to the Congress, and that every Freethinker in the United States and Canada, who can, will be present.

Per order of board of directors:

R. G. INGERSOLL, President.
SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Secretary.
COURTLANDT PALMER, Treasurer.

News and Notes.

I presume the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and subscribers to the Campaign Fund will be interested in a statement of the financial affairs of my lecture trip. This will giv a better understanding of the work accomplished, and the difficulties in the way. Although I hav had what I consider a successful trip, and the Liberals I hav met hav been exceedingly generous, and hav made my labors very pleasant, yet the distances to be traveled are so great, and there is so much to be done in order to arouse large communities and excite attention, that the amount realized above expenses is not sufficient to justify one in making so extensiv a campaign on his individual risk. The mass of the Liberals of this country are not rich. They are, I am glad to say, working people—the most honorable of all—but as they are few in number and widely scattered, the pioneer work of lecturing and organizing can be carried on only by national cooperation. In this way the secretary is enabled to go into new fields, which after a time will amply repay. I desire a frank understanding all round, in order that friends interested in the work of the American Secular Union may know what has been done, how it has been done, and what it has cost, etc., so that, if possible, more excellent plans and methods may be adopted for the future.

The total amount of money received by me as the result of my lecture trip from all sources was $1,262.75. The expenses were as follows: hall rent, $287.50; hotel, $115.50; railroad, $342.81; advertising, $92.49; incidentals, $44.87. Total, $882.72, leaving $380.03 as balance above all expenses. The generous hospitality of friends along the route prevented the hotel bill from being twice as large as it was. I shall make, of course, a more detailed statement, including every item of expenditure, to the annual Congress, for its examination and approval, so that every contributor to the fund will know exactly how the money has been used. In this report I confine myself to the receipts of the lecture field, in order that the needs, difficulties, etc., of pioneering may be understood.

The secretary gave 146 lectures, and received above all expenses $380. This makes about $2.60 for each lecture given—less than the wages of a good mechanic or miner. The secretary, with scarcely an exception, devoted all his time for seven months to the work, and traveled over ten thousand miles. Of the one hundred thousand drummers in the land, I do not think that one of them would go through that amount of labor and travel for the same remuneration. Now, the question for the Liberals of this country and for the American Secular Union to decide is whether this kind of work is valuable, and shall it be sustained? If it is to be sustained, then it must be sustained by a coöperativ effort. The secretary this year has given over one hundred lectures where no Freethought lectures hav been given before, and I venture to say that all of his lectures hav been given at points where there would hav been no lectures otherwise. He has, therefore, not gone over familiar ground, or interfered with other laborers. He has simply put in some extra work which would not hav been done had there been no Secular Union. The Union takes the place of nothing else. It only supplements other instrumentalities—our lecturers, papers, books, etc. If this kind of lecture work is not done by the Union, then it will not be done at all. The policy of the Union was adopted at Cassadaga. It has been pursued with success for two years. I believe much has been accomplished that otherwise would not hav been accomplished. The policy is that of combined effort, the Liberals of the country saying to the secretary, Go into all frontier fields possible, and we will back you up—we will pay the bills. The secretary has done so. In many cases he has assumed the entire responsibility of hall rent, advertising, etc, and the results hav justified his course. In almost every case the local expenses were paid by the communities where the lectures were given, and something above. Audiences of one thousand and fifteen hundred hav been gathered together and a great interest created, and Secular Unions formed, all of which could not hav been done except by the adoption of this policy. The whole lecture trip of the secretary was the result of this policy, and could not hav been made without united effort and support. He could not on his own individual responsibility assume the risks that he did. It would be simply impossible. The figures, as I hav given them, demonstrate this to every generous-minded Liberal. The readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know what has been done through the letters which hav been written from week to week. It is for them to judge, and for those who hav contributed to the campaign fund, whether the acquaintanceship, the interest, the fellowship and noble feeling cultivated by these intercommunications among Liberals shall be continued or not. These questions, and others of practical importance, will come before the New York Congress. I hope there will be a thorough discussion. We want to find the best way. We want to understand each other. We want to help all round. We want to keep every worker in the field. We want to make new opportunities for labor. We want to push things, to arouse, agitate, discuss, reform. I want every Liberal that can to attend this New York Congress. I want as large a delegation as possible from the auxiliary societies. I want a representativ assembly and full and frank expression of opinion. We need to look all difficulties straight in the face. It is no easy task that we undertake. My experience for the past year has given me hope and ardor. I hav met so many earnest friends, and with them come in contact with such splendid inspirations and forces for human improvement and happinesss, that I can only hav an abiding faith in the victory of our cause. Yet I also see the great difficulties that are in the way—the innumerable forces with which we must contend; the organized power that is against us; the ignorance, the bigotry, the prejudice, the indifference, the cowardice; the solid mass of uneducated people, and eight hundred million dollars of untaxed capital in the hands of ecclesiastics who rule by fear and superstition. These things, while they do not discourage nor weaken, make one realize that only by the most stubborn patience and endurance and strenuous exertion can the day be won. The battle is not a brief one. The progress is slow. Each advantage gained only makes the conflict more determined. No flowery path is ours; no music, banners, and torchlight processions, but hard work, and work for many years. Unity, therefore, is necessary in our ranks; fraternal feeling, sincerity, and complete understanding and harmony.

Once before there has been a convention of Freethinkers in New York, as recorded by Mr. Mendum in the Investigator. It was a noble gathering of men and women devoted to liberty and justice. Let the memory of that first meeting stir us to greater effort now, that we of to-day, after so many years, may make another shining landmark in man's intellectual development. There can be no better occasion for a great conference of Liberals, who, gathering hope and energy from the past, shall find the best way to larger and more magnificent enterprise. So I say to all who read this, Come if you possibly can; persuade your friends and neighbors to come; advertise the Congress as widely as possible; take special pains to hav the call published in your city, village, or county newspapers; talk it up wherever you can, and write about it. The program will be published next week. It will be an attractiv one, and I hav no doubt we shall hav the greatest congress of Liberals ever held in this country.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Liberal Club.

It was in expectation of sitting down to an uncommonly gorgeous literary spread that the man with a badge-pin ambled joyously up Third avenue on the evening of Friday, Oct. 15th, to attend the 417th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club. It was a little past eight o'clock, by the gold watch that he got of Mr. Wettstein, when he reached the hall. Proceedings had commenced, the secretary having just arrived at that portion of the minutes of the previous meeting which chronicled the fact that at the usual hour the club adjourned. The hall was full, the women equaling the men in number, and somewhat surpassing them in good looks, though it is well known that the club has many male members who possess great physical beauty. The treasurer, for instance, is not a bad looking man; the librarian, Mr. King, has been spoken of before in this regard, and Vice-President Chamberlain needs no commendation from this feeble pen. A hundred familiar faces were recognized in the audience, and others that were missed will be seen no more in this world forever.

President Wakeman was in the chair, and discharged the duties of that position with dignity and aplomb. There were many notices to read. Meetings would be held at various times and places. The supporters of Henry George would discuss the claims of that gentleman to the office of mayor; a concert would be held for the benefit of Mrs. Parsons, wife of the convicted Anarchist; and the Spiritualists, who yet tarried on the bank and shoal of time, would likewise assemble to discuss the question whether this life is to be continued in our next. Two new applicants offered their names as members of the club, and the Chair urged others to do likewise. For the small sum of fifty cents a quarter they would be given the right to speak upon the platform, and the privilege of growling at the officers.

The speaker of the evening was Prof. Van Buren Denslow. In presenting Mr. Denslow to the audience, the Chair observed that it did not agree with the professor in anything that it knew of.

Professor Denslow was received with applause. He announced that he proposed to consider what are the true relations which Socialism, Communism, and crime bear to our civilization. Crime was, in a large percentage of cases, the outcome of destitution, and destitution was a condition of Communism in which no person had anything except what he owned in common with others. The speaker indorsed Horace Greeley's cure for crime—one hundred and sixty acres of land and a team to work it. Colonization was the only curativ measure that had ever been tried. The criminal needs to be placed back in a simpler state socially. Our civilization is too complex for him. Socialism is the universal state in savage life. There can be no private property among savages, for the reason that their laws are not strong enough to protect it. Socialism is, therefore, an effete condition from which we hav evolved, and not one which we should look forward to. We can learn nothing about true Socialism from the theorizers on that subject, like Henry George. We must depend upon observation, and we can observe its workings best among barbarians. In advocating the nationalization of land Henry George is recommending the methods of barbarism as a cure for the evils of civilization. In all ages men hav followed false prophets. The speaker referred to Moore's Mokanna, the Veiled Prophet of Khorassan, who wore a silver veil, behind which godlike beauty was supposed to be concealed, when, in fact, the veil hid only ugliness, leprosy, and corruption. So, in these days, the people are following a false prophet, none the less false because masquerading behind a veil of sophistry called political economy. A savior from heaven was never more needed than at present. There was no class of people capable of doing as much mischief as those who want to make the world better and don't know how. Incidentally, in the course of his remarks, the professor referred to Martin Irons, and characterized the strike which he ordered in the southwest an act of extreme folly.

The lecture had a somewhat chilling effect upon Mr. George's sympathizers. The Chair announced that the inevitable discussion must ensue, but it would require something besides rhetoric to meet the lecturer's arguments. The floor was open for speeches of ten minutes each, members of the club having the preference.

Mrs. Leonard, the first critic, admonished the professor that we must go back to barbarism not alone for examples of Socialism, but for our first lessons in liberty. Among the North American Indians crime was unknown before these aborigines came in contact with civilization. Somebody in the audience was at this point inconsiderate enough to ask the speaker how she knew that fact, but was silenced by the reply, "I know it." Mrs. Leonard was surprised at Professor Denslow's lack of knowledge, and offered to giv him lessons in political economy free of cost.

Captain Clark next assumed the platform with the remark that he was a neophyte, with a good deal of phyte left in him. He agreed with the lecturer, what that gentleman had said being confirmed by Captain Clark's experience, which was worldwide. The captain prolonged his remarks somewhat, and rambled slightly, so that an auditor was moved to suggest that life was short. Nevertheless, he keeps the people stirred up with his lively humor, and fills a long-felt want.

Dr. Weeks said that a lie which is all a lie may be met and fought with outright, but a lie which is part a truth is a harder matter to fight. Such was the difficulty experienced in meeting the lecture of the evening.

Madam Delescluze complained that ten minutes were quite inadequate to afford her time enough to answer all the fine casuistries of the lecturer. If Communism is barbarous, so is liberty, yet no society can exist that does not hav both for its basis. This city is controled by the slime of the slums, from the judiciary down. The last hour of capital has come, and it must go.

Professor Denslow, in closing the discussion, said he doubted if Madam Delescluze knew anything about the judiciary of this city or any other, whether it was corrupt or not. Violent denunciators were apt to be inaccurate to a marked degree. A protest here from the madam recalled the subject of Martin Irons and the strike he was alleged to hav ordered, and Mr. King arose to explain that Martin Irons never ordered any strike and that Professor Denslow did not know what he was talking about. The professor replied that, presuming Mr. King knew what he was talking about, he was pleased to be corrected. Thus harmony was restored, and the evening's exercises closed amid applause as hearty as that which had marked their opening.

The rest of the program for the month is as follows: 22d, "Mormonism—What It Is and How to Deal with It," by S. P. Putnam; 29th, "Henry George in Politics; or, Ballots Before Bullets," by James Redpath.

It costs but five cents to attend the meetings of this club; and nowhere else is found anything that so fills the empty places in human existence. Hav you trials and temptations, troubles more than you can bear, take this club in Friday evenings; you will find a solace there. Presbyterians and ladies are encouraged to come free of charge.

A MEMBER'S MISFORTUNE.

Among the most liberal and enthusiastic members who joined this year was J. W. Howe, late treasurer of the Secular Union. Mr. Howe was formerly mail carrier, but by recent political changes was substituted for a Milesian member of the faithful. For a few weeks we missed him from his accustomed seat, but hearing he was now engaged Sundays, little dreamed of the true reason of his absence, or of the calamity which had befallen him, until revealed by this brief letter:

COOK COUNTY HOSPITAL, Oct. 7, 1886.

Officers and Members Chicago Secular Union:

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: Some of you, no doubt, hav observed my absence from your meetings, and I write to assure you such absence is not voluntary. I hav had one of my feet smashed by a railroad train, and amputated. Am now in the county hospital. I expect to be at home in a week at 987 Madison street, and would be pleased to see any of you. Wishiug you every success, I remain

Yours sincerely, J. W. HOWE.

It is my desire that we Liberals practically "put him on his feet," and, as he has only one at present, to do that we must substitute a cork foot. He needs one, and it should be our pleasure and privilege to do that little for one of our most energetic workers.

ANARCHIST SPEECHES.

Those speeches, which I send for your personal perusal, hav already revolutionized public sentiment in favor of the condemned. Those of Spies and Fielden are more thoroughly humanitarian, contain greater depth and profound comprehension of social laws, are more sarcastic, logical, brilliant, and fervid than the famous speech of Robert Emmett. Hare declared that "the ultimate tendency of civilization is toward barbarism," and if that verdict is to stand, I think he is about right. Parsons's speech I hav not yet read. To counteract the effect of these speeches, Inquisitor Grinnell is making a lot of sensational newspaper talk about threatening letters being sent to the judge, prosecuting attorneys, jury, etc. If they hav received letters, they or their friends wrote them, as the friends of those men condemned know that to do any such thing would be the greatest possible injury to their case. Their friends would not be such fools. It serves to show what contemptible liars are these limbs of the law.

EPISCOPAL CONVENTION.

After revising the rubric and ritual, the laymen and bishops of the Episcopal convention hav under consideration a change of name, which at the same time indicates the change of front of orthodoxy, and establishes as prophetic the oft-expressed opinion of THE TRUTH SEEKER and Liberals generally, viz., that orthodoxy must eventually fall back on the Catholic church. The name proposed before the convention is the American Catholic Church. It will not take long before some future convention drops the adjectiv, and they fall into the fold of the mother church. Straws indicate which way the wind blows.

CHARLES WATTS,

our first vice-president, lectured here twice last Sunday; in the afternoon on "Atheism and the French Revolution," in the evening on "Saints or Sinners—Which?" There can be no question as to Mr. Watts's great ability, and I think that his lecture on the French Revolution is his most powerful effort; at least, it is most opportune. The French Revolution is a subject on which Americans generally need enlightenment, and this is also a timely topic in view of the growing monopolies which threaten to strangle what little liberty we hav left. To those Liberals interested in social and political reform I can heartily recommend this lecture on the French Revolution. It ought to be given in every town in the land. His evening lecture was a splendid piece of polemics.

Evolution and "Spontaneous Generation."

In a recent number of THE TRUTH SEEKER Mr. D. Priestley, of Milwaukee, briefly criticised two points in my late articles on "Evolution and Special Creation." The gentleman says: "Mr. Watts speaks of 'spontaneous generation' as a part of the process of evolution, whereas, if it were true, it would disprove evolution." Now, it must be admitted that the term "spontaneous generation" is by no means a good phrase, neither is it scientific.. It has come down to us from pre-scientific times, and is seldom used in the present day. The process is now called abiogenesis with Huxley, or archebiosis with Bastian. I shall not, therefore, defend the use of the expression, except on the ground that it is easily understood by the non-scientific. The principle is, however, a different matter. Mr. Priestley says if this "were true it would disprove evolution." But, in my opinion, the reverse is the fact. The evolution of the living from the non-living must be a part of the great scheme. For, otherwise, how did the living organism originate? There is no alternativ but that of miracle. The error that Mr. Priestley appears to me to hav fallen into is in supposing that by "spontaneous generation" is meant that both high and low organisms are thus produced. No one supposes that high organisms can originate in non-living matter, and those of Pouchet doubtless came from germs which all his care had not succeeded in excluding. Indeed, this was proved by Pasteur, a far greater authority than Pouchet. In Bastian's experiments none but the lowest organisms were produced, namely, bacteria and vibriones.

With regard to man being the last and highest animal, all that I meant was, the highest that had yet appeared. What may take place hereafter no one knows. And the theories respecting it are so numerous that their name is legion. The general impression among scientific men is that no higher physical development will take place, as under the rule of man's intellect the struggle assumes a different form. Professor Fiske has, I think, made this clear. But that is no part of my business to discuss now. The long extract from Huxley sets forth a view in which that professor stands almost—if not quite—alone. That, however, in no way affects the position taken in my articles. CHARLES WATTS.

Cause of Earthquakes.

The cause of earthquakes is very plain to one who accepts the theory of world-formation by accretion. More than seven million meteors enter the earth's atmosphere every twenty-four hours. Thus this planet has grown through incomputable ages, and with its growth the increased pressure of gravity enlarges and expands the melted core. For the prodigious force of gravity is all-sufficient to produce the internal heat. But some objector will say, Is not the internal heat radiated? Yes, but only infinitesimally. Science tells us that the radiation to the surface is not one-sixteenth of a degree of Fahrenheit. This is not a thousandth part of the heat which the sun imparts to the earth's surface. The meteoric growth therefore constantly enlarges and expands the melted core, causing cracks in the solid crust.

BURR.

THE donations and legacies to the American Tract Society for the year ending April 1, 1886, amounted to $98,893. The salary list of the officers of the society for the same period was $94,800. A committee will see if they cannot reduce the salary expenses.

Lectures and Meetings.

FROM July 15th to October 15th J. E. Remsburg delivered just one hundred lectures.

W. S. BELL'S list of lectures in Texas, up to November 4th, is as follows: October 16th, Temple; 17th, Belton; 19th Sparta; 20th, Clifton; 21st and 22d, Norse; 23d, Meridian; 24th, Morgan; 25th, Walnut; 28th, Fort Worth; 30th, Terrell; November 2d, Corsicana; 3d, Kerens; 4th, Hubbard City.

CHARLES WATTS lectures for Friendship Liberal League, Philadelphia, in Industrial Hall, Broad and Wood streets, Sunday, Nov. 7th, at 2:30 P.M.; subject, "If a Man Die Shall He Liv Again?—The Secularist Answer." At 7:30 P.M., subject, "Saints and Sinners—Which?" The Liberal public throughout the city and vicinity are cordially invited to cooperate to make these lectures a success. Seats are free.

W. F. JAMIESON'S lectures are called for in Utah, Colorado, and Nebraska. Liberals in Nebraska hav waited for him several weeks, but on account of his engagements in Montana he will be unable to reach them until the latter part of November. He wishes to remain in Nebraska, lecturing every night in the week, and twice or three times every Sunday, until the 1st of February. He is now lecturing in Bozeman, M. T. But it will be best to write him at his permanent address, Lake City, Minn. All mail is promptly forwarded. His line of travel will be along the Union Pacific Railway into Nebraska.

THE seventeenth regular meeting of the Hempstead Freethought Association was held in the new and beautiful reading-room just fitted up at Liberty Hall. The exercises were opened by a very pretty and finely rendered recitation by Miss Ada DeMott, the youngest member. Mr. Chas. B. Reynolds followed with a grand address on "Secularism," giving a lucid exposition and strong defense of Secular principles. Answers to several questions in geology were read by the president, and questions in astronomy and geology propounded for next meeting. Two candidates for membership were proposed by the president and referred to the vigilance committee. The methods employed by this society are positiv and constructiv, which, while they command attention and respect, yet effectually undermine and destroy superstition. The effort so far is a grand success, and we believe that if the same methods were more generally employed, much more progress would be made in the Secular movement. The president, Mr. C. F. DeMott, will be pleased to giv any possible suggestion or information to those desiring to form similar societies.—H. H. GEER, Secretary.

MR. L. K. WASHBURN will be one of the speakers at the coming Congress of the American Secular Union, and has been prevailed on to devote a few weeks to New York state. Now, let every earnest Liberal in our state make this a personal matter. Here is duty, dear reader, for you to do. Who is not deeply interested in removing prejudice from the minds of friends and neighbors? How many noble, generous hearts would cease opposition and heartily join us in our endeavors if they could be made to realize the ennobling principles of Secularism and what our aims and objects really are! Mr. Washburn is a genial gentleman, a scholar, and a genuin Secularist. He never fails to advance the cause wherever he lectures, no matter how fierce the opposition, for he speaks with the glowing eloquence of his young, vigorous manhood and the devotion the glorious truths of Secularism inspire in a warm, generous heart. His lectures are delivered in such a frank, kindly spirit, yet so logical withal, that, while carrying conviction to the mind, he endears himself to the hearts of his hearers. Write Mr. Washburn for dates at once, so that he may arrange his route without having long journeys to and fro, losing both time and money. Let us make an earnest effort, so that not one night of his sojourn in our state shall be without lecture engagement.—C. B. REYNOLDS, Ch. Ex. Com. N. Y. F. A.

Literary.

The Rev. Dr. A. H. Lewis writes in the forthcoming number of the Popular Science Monthly on the orig'n and results of Sunday Legislation. His contention is that the day was first instituted by pagan sun-worshipers, and that it has only been possible to maintain its status in Christian nations by the constant exercise of the authority of the state.

"Men, Women, and Gods," by Helen H. Gardener, has been revised, and issued by The Truth Seeker Company, New York. The introduction by Robert G. Ingersoll is characteristic and emphatic, maintaining that Miss Gardener's arguments are irrefutable. If the writer does not convince the reader, she at least opens up a new field of thought and suggests a critical revision of old belief. The book is interesting from more than one standpoint, and is earnestly written. The author is very strenuous to hav people throw off the shackles of superstition and break away from a blind following after the old teachings about the Bible and religion.—Worcester Spy.

Once a month we are reminded by the reception of Mr. Shaw's Independent Pulpit that Liberalism is a large and growing factor in the civilization of Texas. By his platform and pen efforts Mr. Shaw contributes more than any other man to spread Liberal ideas in a part of the country supposed to be most obdurate in its belief in ancient errors. The twenty-four pages of the October number of the Pulpit are filled with contributions from talented writers, and editorials of solid worth. Mr. Shaw's policy is to secure articles that shall be of permanent value to the cause of Freethought, that may be used by other writers as references. In this he has, so far, been very successful, and a file of the Pulpit is a Freethought cyclopedia of argument. There is a wide field for a magazine of this character, and the Pulpit covers it in an admirable manner.

Socialism in India.

II.

Natural polygamists marry more than one wife, and support them too. The American monogamist does the same, but supports one wife at a time. He marries and is divorced, remarries and is redivorced, so that one person may ever hav as many wives or husbands in his or her lifetime, without bearing their burden, as the natural polygamists do. This sort of thing leads to a life devoid of any sacredness about it except that of loose, slippery character; it leads to anarchy, and saps the foundation of society. Money-eyed people alone can marry. Matrimony is a lottery, and woman is the prize which falls to the lot of a few, so that seventy-five per cent are forced into single life against their will. They therefore take to drinking and licentiousness. In each city there are thousands of unmarried men and women. Instead of leading a lewd life, if these women will enter into matrimony and reform on Potter's wheel so many men, they will entirely do away with anarchy and rowdiness, which hav disfigured this country; not only this, but these women will be the benefactors of society, by establishing social peace and political tranquility. But no, such will not be the case. American freedom, liberty, and independence will revolutionize the whole world, and make life and property unsafe and uncertain. I should therefore like to beg you to patiently listen to the history of India, where all the problems of life, right and wrong, government and religion, hav scientifically been solved.

The Western writers hav attempted to prove that both the Hindoos and Europeans originally belonged to one Aryan family, of which one-half migrated to the east and the other to the west. I do not like to enter into this discussion. I however firmly believe that each country, climate, and soil has its own productions peculiar to itself. Earth, water, air, and wind are full of life-germs when heated by fire. I therefore maintain that the Hindoos were born in and belonged to India as her natural productions.

For eighteen hundred years the West treated the East as savage, barbarous, and semi-civilized. The European called the Eastern people by all choice names, such as pagan or heathen. I do not, therefore, understand why they should now try to consider the Hindoos as their brothers, and claim to hav belonged to that Aryan stock whose shadow, some years ago, was a contamination to the white people. The Englishman is proud of tracing his genealogy back to some king or queen. Until the Englishman, Sir William Jones, and his compeers, led the way into the splendid garden of Sanscrit literature; until the astonished eye of the West saw its glorious flowers of poesy, its fruits of philosophy and metaphysics, its crystal-like rivulets of science, its magnificent structure of philosophy, no one dreamed the world had had any history worth speaking of before the times of the Greek and Roman civilization. But now the Europeans would like to be the descendants of the Aryan race. Let them be as they wish; I must confine myself to the Socialism of India. I beg your pardon for any deviation I may hav made in my discourse. I hav dwelt more on England and America than I intended.

The Hindoos, like the English, hav had their kings and queens, but they were rather the incarnation of their deities than their tyros. The land belonged to the subjects, so that every man has his own piece of ground to plow and cultivate for the support of his family. Sufficient unto the day was the evil thereof. The Hindoos do not strive to compete and emulate. Every man has a right to raise enough corn for himself and his family. Anything beyond that is considered sinful and an offense against his neighbor. Small villages are formed, and surplus product, if any, stored up right in the village, as an insurance against famin and hard times. As varieties of products were raised by different farmers, their exchange were thought indispensably necessary. Labor was thus divided, and traders or exchangers were selected from among the farming or indigenous population. Their business was to exchange goods and receive commissions in kind. These were all peaceful settlers, recognizing the brotherhood of man, though different in occupations. Both the farming and trading communities became flourishing, and were so engrossed by business that they knew not how to guard themselvs against disturbances and protect from wild animals. About the time when the demand for protection grew paramount, some noble and self-sacrificing souls came forward and volunteered their services for the purpose. They were called soldiers or warriors. The Indian history is replete with the lives of such illustrious personages. Their names are holy and sacred. They are dear to every Hindoo. They are our gods. We make their images and worship them. Nowhere is the warrior-class so well revered and respected. We hav erected temples and monuments in commemoration of their auspicious advents on earth. Foreigners, especially missionaries, do not know that the images placed in our temples are not images of that omniscient god, but of our protectors. The Hindoos are hero-worshipers. They always pray to that unseen power for such pious protectors. We pay voluntary homage to them; hence, no taxes are levied on us by our kings, and anything given involuntarily and with an unwilling heart was sinful. The farmers, the traders, and the protectors, therefore, lived peacefully and harmoniously, one acknowledging the necessity of another for his own goods. This went on without a hitch for centuries; but as society began to multiply another necessity arose, that of educating their children, and making social and political laws and laws of inheritance. Each class had enough on hand and could not divide attention. They thought that educators and legislators should be unselfish and impartial. They should be free from self interest in works of education and legislation. They saw that parents should not be entrusted with care of their children, because of their natural tendency to impart selfish instruction to them. A fourth class was therefore appointed out of these elders, who renounced themselvs and took a vow that they would on no account seek the pleasures of this world and lay treasures on earth. This class is called the Brahmans, or the spiritual nobility of India. They were unselfish; cared not for frown or flattery, gold or silver, palace or place. The whole world was their home, all mankind their people, and to do good was their religion. Who will not respect such a person, who denies himself, nay, even sacrifices his times and power, for human happiness, without expecting any reward in return?

So you see we hav had in India, first of all, the farmers and laborers who owned the land and raised crops. Then came the traders or mercantil community, at the seeking of the farmers, for doing the exchange business. The merchants, having in their possession the products of the land for exchange, prayed and secured the assistance of defenders of peace and protectors of property. This third class, as I said before, were the soldiers or warriors of India. They, in fact, were the rulers or kings of the Hindoos. They also felt the need of counselors and advisers, and selected from among themselvs and other two lower classes such persons who were universally respected. A fourth class was therefore added, who took the responsibility of instructing and governing the three lower classes enumerated above. That there might not be abuse of power, misappropriation of property, and unjust demands, the fourth class, called the Brahmans, made beneficent laws, touching on social relations, rights of man, politics, and religion, and thus maintained the equilibrium of commonwealth.

This way, you see, in India farmers and laborers are the property-holders. They are in full possession of all they produce. They, however, seek the assistance of traders for exchange, and expect exact return, but the merchants, like the capitalists in England and America, became speculators, and grew rich. Our lawgivers hav therefore imposed upon them the religious duty of distributing food among the poor and giving clothes to the naked. They hav religiously enjoined the merchants to giv their neighbors a periodical feast twice a year, so that what little money they make by unjust speculations is thus employed for charitable purposes, and in fulfilment of social obligation. In this manner the paupers, who in other countries hav become a source of anxiety and trouble to the wealthy, are easily tranquilized, and bound in obligation in my country. The Hindoo lawgivers fully recognized that in the order of things adversity and prosperity must go hand-in-hand, and the influence of one should be counterbalanced by another. If one, by extreme indolence and sluggishness, becomes poor, another, by extreme vigilance and watchfulness, becomes rich, and both, in the scale of law and justice, are guilty, and must be punished—the poor for his laziness and the rich for his sharpness. The poor is proscribed heaven as long as he eats the bread and drinks the water of charity; the rich is debarred from celestial empire until the sins he committed in hoarding money by unjust means are washed away by feeding and clothing the poor with due respect. No social degradation or elevation is ascribed to the acts of giving or receiving charity. If a person, in doing charity, showed any superiority to one whom he fed and clothed, he was at once deprived of his merit; on the other hand, the recipient is made to believe that he increases the burden of his debt as long as he does not eat by the sweat of his brows. Thus the capital and labor was equalized without strikes. Why will the poor destroy the property of the rich if the latter will recognize them as their unfortunate brothers? But the capitalists in England and America will never do so; they hav grown so selfish and so indifferent that they do not feel ashamed to bribe literary men to defend their cause. I do not, therefore, know how their life and property could be safe and secure. The Hindoo capitalists and laborers neither dreaded nor planned such results. They never sought emigrants from abroad and then expelled them by force. India always has had enough work for laborers. As she never aimed at competition, so she never needed surplus labor. Farmers are considered the benefacters of society, and laborers their bosses. Rich folks are generally in plain attire, but their servants must be in livery of gold and silver, silk and satin. It is no shame for a master to be shabbily dressed, but his servant must be well fed and clothed, otherwise he is impeached.

GOPAL VINAYAK JOSHEE.

(TO BE CONCLUDED.)

Montana.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In this letter I will giv you a little theology. There is not the least doubt that Christians hav turned a longing eye toward these silver hills. Their theory is that the hills, as well as the cattle, are the Lord's. On the same train I came on, for two days there was a superintendent of the Young Men's Christian Association. He gave me his card, but had no inclination to talk theology. Christians seldom want to talk with anybody unless one agrees with them. He got off at Helena, and I saw by the press, afterward, that he is occupied organizing those assassination societies. Christians put their money (and all they can get of other people's) into untaxed buildings. They know that wealth lends respectability to their church. The question is not so much, with them, the truth of a doctrin, as its respectability. Look at the Catholic church. For four hundred years it has withstood the assaults of reason, and boasts of it. In this country it is the most powerful organization—has the largest following of any sect.

In Butte last Monday a column-and-a-half sermon of Priest Cushnahan was reported in the daily. He probably has more talent than any Protestant preacher in the city. We naturally expect the clearest statements and the most convincing logic from so learned a source. Else of what practical value is the education about which the Christians continually boast? Of what earthly account are the colleges upon which both Catholic and Protestant churches pride themselvs, if the preaching of priest and preacher does not commend itself to the plain dictates of common sense? What do we get from the most learned of them? Assertions without proof. Dogmatizing without end. To make this plain to anyone disposed to reason, we will giv a few extracts from Father Cushnahan's sermon, which was considered valuable enough to print in a daily which charges ten cents a word for notices of our lectures in Renshaw's Opera House. Said the priest:

> My friends, if we admit a God, as every individual must if he trifles not with the reason that is in him, we must, at the same time, admit that we are bound to believe all he asks us to believe. This Reason herself tells, because if his existence be admitted, it must also be admitted that he is superior to us, as he is, and must be, the cause of our existence. There must be some first cause prior to man, that gave man existence, because from nothing nothing is made. This first cause is God, hence our superior—he the Lord, we the servants—and hence our duty to believe what he commands us to believe.

So popular is Catholicism here, and so admired is this priest, that he was invited to lecture in the Grand Opera House. One hundred and fifty business men signed the invitation, and the house was packed at a dollar a ticket. Yet, great as he is, he uttered the foregoing nonsensical statements. About everything which a priest or preacher says must be taken for granted. Is it the fault of the man, or the religion? Some Catholics hav been attending my lectures, and evidently that sermon was delivered and printed for the purpose of counteracting the bad influence of my addresses. We hav had but few Catholics out since. I would, therefore, like to hav as many of them see this article as possible.

Let us now dissect the sermon.

Why not prove a God? Is it not incumbent on the one who affirms to do this? Certainly. Who, then, trifles with reason? The Christian does who wants you to take his bare assertions without proof. If Christians would submit their every statement to reason, their church would collapse before the end of a century.

This priest piles admissions on top of each other in profusion. He wants everybody to "admit" a God exists; next that the God speaks to us, when it is only the priest who speaks for God; and next we must believe what God tells us (that is, what the priest tells us). No theological juggling about that!

We must also "admit" that this God, who depends for his existence upon a priestly begging of the question, is superior to us. Take the gentleman's own Bible for it, and he is greatly inferior to us.

The priest makes but one attempt at argument, and hopelessly breaks down. There must be some first cause prior to man, because from nothing nothing is made, he argues. The Christian church has always insisted that nothing is exactly the stuff out of which this entire universe was made. The gentleman's "argument" would be just as sound if he should say there must be some first cause prior to God that gave God existence, because from nothing nothing is made. But right here is where the Christian "begs," makes an intellectual pauper of himself.

The priest tells us that because God is our superior it is our duty to believe what he commands us to believe. He then proceeds at length to show that the Catholic church is the direct lineal descendant of Christ and the apostles, as if they were all here now to do their own preaching, that would settle, beyond all successful contradiction, that their words were all true. Then, with the flourish of an old-fashioned stage-driver blowing his horn and cracking his whip, as he drives into town, the priest knocks over the Protestants as a set of pretenders. Hear him:

No one of the sects can apply this argument, because no one can span the distance of time between the apostles and us. They all hav originated too late or died too soon. Let it prove much or little, it proves this—that the body claims to be the church of Christ, and coming down with uninterrupted historic existence, for Christ to us is the body that is in common with the see of Rome, and recognizes in the successor of Peter the vicar of Christ.

Of course, this divine commission of Christ has been denied, but a denial to be of any weight must hav a reason, and a higher reason than affirmation denied. A person can deny only by an authority sufficient to warrant an affirmativ. A simple denial or negativ proves or disproves nothing. Yet the reformers only opposed the simple negativ; they opposed to her no authority, no truth. Their denials were based upon no authoritativ truth, and consequently only allegations. They opposed their own simple judgment or caprice against an authority acknowledged for sixteen centuries. They may deny and cavil as they please, but I question the world, Where is the truth outside of her in any religion or heresy in science that she denies or does not recognize or hold and teach in its unity and catholicity? All who reject her hav no truth to oppose to her, no reason for their denial and principle on which to base their rejection of her authority.

This much is certain, it is either the church or nothing. There is no alternativ. It is the greatest absurdity, for those who reject her authority and to pretend to be Christians because they hav no grounds of belief of what is or what is not Christ's revelation, duty and manly anthems. Hence, it is the Catholic who is the only man that has the mental freedom, a reason why he believes and authority that cannot deceive. His faith makes him free. Who can be freer than he who held to believe and obey only God?

All sects of Christians believe that Christ revealed his actions and instituted a church, and that it was Catholic and apostolic.

Severe on the Protestants. If the priest and his church are right, we Infidels hav as good a chance for heaven as the Infidel Protestant. Father Cushnahan settles the whole matter. He says: "The church accredits herself. It is on her fidelity, her vigilant guardianship and uniform testimony, that we depend for our confidence in the genuinness and authority of the scriptures."

He proves the church true by the Bible and proves the Bible true by the church. That is the logic of the priest; but thoroughbred logicians call it "reasoning in a circle—vicious reasoning." To show that this is what he does I will giv his own words:

It is in perfect keeping and harmony with reason to believe on his word. Reason and the dictates of a rightly balanced mind say, Yes, we should believe the word of God; but how know we the word of—how know we what is proposed to us as the word of God is God's word? The Mormon holds one thing to be the revelation of God; the Catholic holds directly the opposit to be the word of God, and this party something different. We take the fact that this is his word on the authority of the Catholic church. Believe it to be his word because she declared it to be.

Now, what will every honest thinker say when I show that the priest makes all his assumptions depend upon the veracity of the Bible God? Let him again speak for himself:

The mind, well arranged, with its faculties in full play, cannot conceive a lying God, a God asking man to believe what is false and untrue. Now, this is the very ground of the Christian's belief. He believes the revealed truth on the veracity of God, because it is his word, and it is impossible for his word to be false. What God says is, and must be, true, and there is no higher ground for belief or faith, nay, even knowledge, than to know that fact that God says it.

Now, turn with me to the gentleman's scriptures. "Doubtless ye shall not come into the land, concerning which I sware to make you dwell therein," save Caleb and Joshua. "Your carcases shall fall in this wilderness," "and ye shall know my breach of promis" (Num. xiv, 30, 32, 34).

He confesses his breach of promis.

Again: "If the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the Lord hav deceived that prophet" (Ezek. xiv, 9).

The "scriptures" say this God also sanctioned lying in others. Read: "The Lord said, Who shall persuade Ahab, that he may go up and fall at Ramoth-Gilead? And one said on this manner, and another said on that manner. And there came forth a spirit, and stood before the Lord, and said, I will persuade him. And the Lord said unto him, Wherewith? And he said, I will go forth, and I will be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. And he said, Thou shalt persuade him, and prevail also; go forth, and do so. Now, therefore, behold, the Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these thy prophets, and the Lord hath spoken evil concerning thee."

Can it be that the priest ever read these passages?

Take one example from the New Testament: "God shall send them strong delusion that they should believe a lie" (2 Thes. ii, 11).

Cannot conceive, says the priest, "a lying God, a God asking man to believe what is false and untrue." But there is the proof that his God did that very thing. The priest has deceived his people. And if he never read these texts, he has deceived himself. After one's pointing it out to him, showing him that his Bible God has deceived and deluded the people "that they should believe a lie," as an honest man he will abandon the Bible God, and leave the Christian church. There is no other course left for him, for he says himself that belief in a truthful God is "the very ground of the Christian's belief." If, as Christians hav often said, a man should giv up life itself for the truth, then he should certainly giv up the church for the sake of truth. Manhood is more noble than priesthood.

W. F. JAMIESON.

Freethought in Australia.

Australia is rapidly coming to the fore with Freethought and radical newspapers. A few years ago, with the exception of an occasional short-lived venture in New South Wales, Freethinkers had little in the periodical line to boast of. Now things are changed. We hav not only the Liberator in Melbourne, and the Rationalist in New Zealand, but New South Wales issues a new two-cent weekly paper called The Reflector, a neat and tastily designed sheet of four pages, of which Mr. Thomas Walker is editor; and at Adelaide, South Australia, there has been recently started a four-cent weekly newspaper called Our Commonwealth, an ably written and well conducted political and labor journal of a somewhat advanced radical nature; the latter is edited by Mr. Ignatius Singer.

The Freethinker and New South Wales Reformer, edited by Mr. W. W. Collins, of Sydney, is unfortunately approaching its demise. It has been issued for twenty-two weeks, but is only to run a number or two longer, when it will be incorporated in its larger rival, the Liberator, and Mr. Collins will contribute articles to the latter paper. Although it is a matter of regret that so useful a paper should meet with so untimely an end, there are fortunately the others ready to fill its place. The Freethinker, however, has not lived in vain. The Sydney School of Arts has been quarreling over the question of its admission to their table, and the question has just been settled by a count of noses, deciding upon its exclusion. Alf. Barry, the bishop of Sydney, has had his little say in the matter. In a letter to a daily paper, he says: "I entirely sympathize with you about the Freethinker. It is not a matter of belief or unbelief, but of common decency. Every man has a right to publish his own opinions, but on such subjects it should be with gravity and right consideration of the feelings and faith of others." This letter, as a matter of course, brought out a spirited reply from Mr. Collins, in which he completely turned the tables upon the Bible-worshiping bigot.

Mr. Collins is having another little battle—this time with a champion of the spiritual faith, Mr. George Chainey. The debate is upon the respectiv merits and demerits of Spiritualism and Secularism, Mr. Chainey supporting the former, and Mr. Collins the latter. The debate, which is to extend over six nights, is being reported in the press, and is provoking great interest.

In Victoria matters hav been somewhat quieter of late; the prosecutions of the Freethinkers hav been allowed to lapse, and nothing is now heard of them. An occasional threat and reminder is thrown out by the officials, but nobody takes any notice of it, and everybody seems to be satisfied. Mr. Symes is getting comfortably settled down here, and his lectures are as well patronized as ever. The Liberator continues to hold its own, and has lately been increased from sixteen to twenty pages; the illustrations, too, hav considerably increased in merit and are well appreciated by the subscribers.

Some little interest has been caused in Melbourne lately by the formation of the Melbourne Anarchist Club on the 1st of May last. The principles of the club are identical with those of your Boston contemporary, Liberty. Debates upon the principal social and political topics hav been held weekly, and they hav proved highly successful. The breadth of the platform has caused those possessing the most diversified views to freely express them; and these debates, which hav not been unlike those of the Manhattan Liberal Club (if I may judge by the reports of your facetious man with the badge-pin) hav proved vastly instructiv.

There is plenty of trade depression in these colonies just now, and strikes are taking place everywhere, while the unemployed are growing numerically stronger, and are holding meetings petitioning the legislators to provide them with employment. At one of these meetings, in Melbourne, the other day, a scrimmage took place between the police and the employment-seekers, plenty of blood being shed by the policemen's handcuffs and batons. Three of the unfortunates were imprisoned for taking a conspicuous part in the affair. During their trial an episode occurred worthy of our Christian colony with its Christian institutions. One gentleman, who had been present at the affray, desired to giv evidence in favor of the prisoners, who he averred had merely acted in self-defense; but, because he stated his desire to make an affirmation in preference to an oath, the magistrate refused to giv him a hearing; and Mr. Fleming, the gentleman in question, had to endure the mortification of hearing only one side of the case stated, and of seeing these starving men hurried off to jail to satisfy the whim of this insolent representativ of justice.

The Christians in this part are not very activ just at present, the Anglican bishop having left for Manchester without providing a substitute, and the Papist archbishop having left for Kingdum Kum with the same hasty want of precaution. The latter has left behind him a memory which is still green—although much to the disadvantage of his character. I post you a copy of a pamphlet concerning him, which his solicitor has just published a new edition of; it might prove as interesting as instructiv.

Freethought is being vigorously pushed ahead in Queensland. Dr. J. L. York, who lately debated with the newly arrived Scottish champion of anti-Infidelity, Mr. H. A. Long, has been lecturing there with great success. He has also formed a Freethought organization, known as the Gympie Freethought Union, and similar to the one which he formed some time ago in Sydney, New South Wales.

Tasmania is still groping in the darkness of "Christian enlightenment," and Freethought makes little headway there. A few weeks ago, an attempt was made to silence a Freethought lecturer in Hobart by a policeman threatening to arrest him for treason if he dared to speak again; but the lecturing has gone on as usual, and the blue-coated official has not again interfered.

The New Zealand Freethinkers hav received an unpleasant experience in the departure of Robert Stout to the folds of aristocracy. Little did they expect that one who had so strongly condemned the use of titles in his paper two or three years ago would so suddenly hav accepted a knighthood, as Robert Stout—now Sir Robert Stout—has done. If Mr. Stout has deteriorated, however, Mr. Joseph Evison has not, but has more than compensated for the loss of the ex-Radical. The Rationalist has constantly increased in intrinsic merit, the latter numbers comparing favorably with the earlier ones, and purely Secular matters receiving a far larger share of attention, while the editor has still retained his determined and plain-speaking policy.

All things considered, the prospects of Freethought in Australia are very cheering, and when there is taken into account the increasing amount of Freethought lecturers and Freethought newspapers, together with new Freethought societies and similar unions; and especially when there is noted the increasing interest taken by Freethinkers and others in the practical affairs of this world, there is every reason to expect further progress in the future.

DAVID A. ANDRADE.

South Yarra, Melbourne, Aus., Sept. 7, 1886.

Mr. Bell's Progress.

Leaving Chicago, September 27th, for our long-contemplated trip to Texas, and having several engagements on the way, the first place reached was Wheeler, Ill., and the second, Kirkville, Mo. We are now about to make a bee-line for Denison, Tex.

We began a course of lectures in Wheeler, September 28th, to a very good audience, and on each succeeding evening the audience was larger than that of the evening previous, so that at the last lecture all that came could not find room in the house, and many stood at the windows, outside.

Several ministers were present, and took notes. At the close of each lecture, I invited them to stand up and defend their faith, but they kept silent, thinking that "mum" was the best thing they had to offer. At the close of my last lecture, I made a point to call the attention of the audience to the fact that the ministers did not dare to defend their creeds, and even this dig could not bring them to their feet.

Mine were the first lectures ever given here on Freethought, and, just think of it! in a new church at that; one not yet dedicated. It will take a vast amount of fumigation or holy water to sanctify that temple to make it a fit place for the holy people of God to worship in.

Among the good Liberals here, I made the acquaintance of Charles Hess, Dr. Chapman, Milton Hand, and Charles Harwood. The only fault I hav to find with some of the friends here is that they do not take the papers. I cannot understand what a Freethinker can be doing with his thinker when he does not take even one Liberal paper, and I told some of them so, and they promised to reform and do better in the future. We shall see.

Our good brother Hess and his happy family, who liv four miles out of town, entertained us splendidly. The surviving spring chickens were the only ones who chuckled when we left.

After much tribulation we got across the country to Kirkville, Mo. Here we were cordially entertained by Mr. and Mrs. William Hart, who hav kept lecturers' hotel for many years.

Brother Hart introduced us to a large but not very brilliant audience. We managed, however, to hold them, and occasionally to break the solemnity of some of their sad, dull countenances.

By the time this reaches you I shall be in Texas.

Kirkville, Mo., Oct. 4, 1886. W. S. BELL.

Our Mayoralty Candidates.

Henry George, the Labor candidate, is an Episcopalian. At a meeting last Sunday he refused to speak upon politics further than to say that it was the business of all to ascertain the will of God and then to do it. On week days Mr. George's modesty does not prevent him from asserting that the will of God is that all should vote for him on November 2d.

Abram Hewitt, the Democratic candidate, is the fussy gentleman who refused to rent Cooper Union for the reception of D. M. Bennett, when he came out of the Albany bastile. It will be recollected that Chickering Hall, though accommodating some two thousand, was inadequate to hold the masses who desired to assure the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER that his imprisonment was a Christian outrage.

Theodore Roosevelt, the Republican candidate, before he was a politician was a Freethinker. The Times asserts that he has changed his views, and now believes that Jonah lived three days in the belly of a whale.

The world calls these three men honest—and no doubt they are.

Inspiration.

The following, from an article by Dr. Samuel T. Spear, places the doctrin of plenary inspiration of the Bible upon its rightful level—entirely dependent upon the authority of that book:

"If any one wishes to know what is the true doctrin of inspiration, his proper course is not to speculate on the subject, not to assume any à priori knowledge in regard to it, and not to attempt any improvements upon what the Bible says, but to read and study the words of Christ in the promis of inspiration, and also the words of his apostles in their statement of the doctrin. The Bible itself is far the best treatis on inspiration ever written, and the only one that is absolutely conclusiv. It asserts and explains its own inspiration. The Christian, whether the occupant of the pulpit as a preacher of the gospel or of the pew as a hearer, can, on this subject, as on every other relating to religion, do no better than to rest his faith on what it it says. He can in no other way do as well. Let him never forget that, independently of the teaching of the Bible, he knows nothing on the subject."

This, it seems to us, is virtually surrendering the Bible as the word of God, and placing it upon the same footing as other alleged sacred works. Starting from the only known fact about the Bible—that it exists to-day in book form—the problem raised by the Christians is, What authority has the book over men? The Christian answer is that the book is a divinely-inspired work, written by the direction and under the supervision of God; that it records God's works and God's teachings; that it is necessarily without error in fact or theory (seeing an infallible God cannot err); that it is a rule of faith and life which ought to be believed and obeyed, and must be believed and obeyed to earn a heaven or escape an eternal hell; and that nothing is to be added to it, either by "new revelations of the spirit or traditions of men." These are the assumptions made for the Bible.

These assumptions are made by Dr. Spear to rest for their proof upon the Bible itself, and consequently it is only to that work that we can go for the answer to the question, What authority has the Bible over men? A skeptic would immediately pin the Christian to the entomological board with "What is the Bible?" The Christian answers, "The word of God." "Well, who is God?" "God," responds the believer, "is a most pure spirit, who is infinit in being and perfection, invisible, without body, parts, or passions, immutable, immense, eternal, incomprehensible, almighty, most wise, most holy, most free, most absolute, working all things according to the counsel of his own immutable and most righteous will, for his own glory; most loving, gracious, merciful, long-suffering, abundant in goodness and truth, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin; the rewarder of them that diligently seek him; and withal most just and terrible in his judgments; hating all sin, and who will by no means clear the guilty." "That may be a true description of him, but how do you prove the existence of such a being?" "By his word and spirit." "What is his word?" "The holy scriptures of the Old and New Testaments." "Ah! yes; you prove God by the book and the book by—what?" "The book? Oh, we prove the book by itself!"

The claim that the Bible is an inspired work must necessarily rest upon the acknowledgment that there is a God to inspire; it must be further proved that such a God could inspire it, and that he did. But unless the existence of God is first proved, the Christian is stopped from further claims. A book cannot be the record of a God's works and teachings unless that God exists to hav a record and to teach. But outside of the book there is no such evidence. In the book, however, it is asserted there is a God, who inspired its writing. The question then turns upon the truth or falsity of the book itself. If it be shown that there is no error in the book, then the Christian can go on with his claims. But if there is an error—only one would be sufficient—then the Bible cannot possibly be the work of an infallible God. Dr. Spear's limitation of the proof of inspiration limits the question to, Is the Bible true? Is it what it purports to be—a record of God's works or of its teaching? Is it infallible? Is it without error in fact or theory? Is it such a rule of faith that he who believes it earns a heaven, or that he who obeys it escapes eternal torture? Is its affirmation of a heaven true? Is its description of hell true? Is it the final true word upon all religious matters? If not, then it could not hav been inspired by a God answering to the description of the Christian. But if God is a most pure spirit, as the Christians claim upon Biblical authority, he could not hav dictated the mass of corruption found in the Old Testament; if he is infinit, he could not hav compressed himself to walk in a garden with a fence around it; if he is perfection itself, he could not hav made an imperfect world; if he is without body or parts, Moses could not hav seen one part of his body; if he is passionless, he could not be angry at his foes; if he is eternal, where was he before the beginning? If he is incomprehensible, how could the writers of the Bible comprehend him sufficiently to describe him? If he is almighty, he could not hav been thwarted in his purpose by an iron wagon; if he is most wise, he would not hav made the mistake of creating a world that he had to drown; if he is most holy, he would never hav commanded the unholy slaughter of whole nations; if he is most free and absolute, the devil could not checkmate him; if he worketh all things for his own glory, he would not let the immense majority of the world liv and die without knowing anything about himself; if he is most loving, he would not hav conducted so many unrighteous wars. If he is gracious, why is he a tyrant? If he is merciful, why did he not show mercy to his enemies? If he is abundant in goodness, why is not every one of his supposed creatures happy? If he hates all sin, why does he permit it to exist? If he is just in his judgments, why let the murderer get to heaven and the good man go to hell? It cannot be that the Bible description of God is true, and therefore, according to Dr. Spear, the Bible cannot be inspired.

But if the Bible errs in its attributes of God, how much more unreliable is it when recording human and historical events! The Bible begins with a mistake, and ends with a statement impossible of verification; and between the first verse of Genesis and the last verse of Revelation there are thirty or forty thousand errors of fact in history, in geology, in astronomy, in chronology, in physiology, in philosophy, in morals, in all sciences and upon all subjects of which it treats. Its figures are wrong, its statements are false, its genealogy absurd, its authors unknown; its heroes men of war and rapine, of lust and brutality; its heroins women who crawl into barns with men, who drive nails into the temples of sleeping enemies, who sit by the roadside to tempt men, and who bear children without known fathers. Can such a mass of corruption be God's holy word? Can divine inspiration for itself be proved by such a book? Dr. Spear will hav to find some other authority than the Bible—if he can.

The Constitution of New York State.

Whatever the voters of this state may think of the various parties asking their votes this fall, or whatever the issues may be between them, there is one important issue that should receive the affirmativ votes of all the electors. That issue is whether a state convention shall be called to devise a better state constitution. The present organic law of this state contains this clause:

"At the general election to be held in the year eighteen hundred and sixty-six, and in each twentieth year thereafter, . . . the question, 'Shall there be a convention to revise the constitution, and amend the same?' shall be decided by the electors qualified to vote for members of the legislature; and in case a majority of the electors so qualified, voting at such election, shall decide in favor of a convention for such purpose, the legislature at its next session shall provide by law for the election of delegates to such convention" (Art. 13, Sec. 2).

At the election this autumn the question whether such a convention shall be held is to be determined.

There are several provisions in our present constitution which are in direct conflict with the demands of Liberalism; and there are dozens of laws upon our statute books which ought to be rendered null and void, and their further enactment impossible, by judicious provisions in the organic law. California solved the problem of the separation of church and state by the adoption of a constitution which makes it impossible for the legislature to exempt religious corporations from taxation, or to vote the people's money away in gifts to religious institutions. The question of oaths, also, is settled by the constitution. New York's present constitution exempts ministers from taxation on the first fifteen hundred dollars' worth of real estate. A new constitution should leave this clause out. In fact, at a convention for the revision of the constitution, the whole of the Nine Demands can be rendered operativ by prohibiting clauses being inserted forbidding our legislators to practically unite the state to the church, as they hav done in the past—that is, if the delegates to the convention will listen to their presentation. That they can be induced to do so there is but little doubt.

This will be one of the best ways that can be devised for Freethinkers to accomplish their aims. If the work is done, then it will stay done. But though we should fail in getting all demands granted, some of them may be, and the adoption of even one would be a great victory for justice. It is, therefore, important that the convention be called, and as it will require a majority of all votes cast at the coming election to insure the calling of the convention, every voter should remember to cast a ballot for it.

We are now living under the constitution of 1846. The constitution proposed at the convention of 1867 was rejected by the people with the exception of the judiciary clause, upon which a separate vote was taken. In 1846 ministers and churches were regarded as in some way sacred. Since then public opinion has changed greatly, and it may be possible to deal with them as with any other social factor. In 1846 religious corporations were not the power they now are. They did not then own millions of dollars' worth of real estate, the exemption of which added an almost intolerable burden to the taxation of other property. They were not then the rapacious speculators in land that they hav since become. The people mistakenly regarded them as honest institutions, and exempted their property. A great many people so regard them to-day, but there is a wide difference of opinion on that subject, and a convention will be an excellent place to emphasize that difference, with the chance to make it practical. If, when the work of such a convention is submitted to the people, they hav the opportunity to vote on the question of exempting church property, we hope they will follow the lead of the people of California and Washington Territory, and decline to do it.

"The Truth Seeker" Vindicated.

The Augustinian College at Rome has sent its prior to Ireland, bearing a letter from the pope, begging the Irishmen to contribute funds to build an Irish national church in Rome, to be dedicated to St. Patrick. All the Irish archbishops are warmly supporting the project.

The daily Northwestern, of Oshkosh, Wis., calls attention to the fact that the same day these ecclesiastical beggars arrived in Rome, the daily papers of this country contained a long and urgent appeal from the president of the "National League of America" calling upon Irishmen, Irish-Americans, and sympathizers with Ireland to send contributions to the "anti-eviction" fund. The appeal set forth the destitute and starving condition of the Irish tenantry and the horrible results of the enforcement of the eviction laws. Contrasting the mission of the pope's agent to Ireland with the appeal of the "National League," the Northwestern says: "With what consistency can the National League of this country and the friends of poor Ireland ask the public to donate to the suffering people of that country, who need all the aid they can get, when the Vatican dispatches a deputation among those for whom aid is asked to beg of them for a building fund to erect an Irish national church at Rome and dedicate it to St. Patrick, or any other saint? It is food and shelter at home, and not national churches at Rome, that the poor of Ireland now most need. If there is spare money in Ireland to build national churches in Rome, there is spare money in Ireland to help the unfortunate tenants threatened with eviction. It is little less than clerical imposition to ask the Irish people to build national churches at Rome, while those same people are calling upon America for help. Let them assist the helpless, and build national churches in Rome afterward."

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 20th we printed a picture upon the same subject. Uncle Sam was pouring money into the hat of the Irish pauper at the front door of his cabin, and that pauper's wife was pouring the money through the back window into the pope's hands. The idea represented by this picture was viciously denounced as false, and one officious blatherskite attempted to "boycott" THE TRUTH SEEKER because of its publication. To be perfectly consistent, the people who objected to the picture ought now to veto the pope's project, by boycotting either him or the begging hat of the "National League of America."

The Wolfish Unity.

There are some Christians who desire a unity of the sects of Christendom. Just what their reasons are for desiring this unity we do not know, unless it be, as some ministers hav put it, to suppress Infidelity. But for that purpose we do not see that they need to further unite, for, fighting as they do among themselvs, they somehow manage to present a solid front to the common enemy. Heber Newton fights his own church, and all the other churches that attempt to meddle with him, but he goes with Talmage and the Catholics when Ingersoll is under consideration. Discordant, dissevered, and belligerent as the church is, she manages to keep blasphemy laws upon most of our state statute books, and heap legal disabilities upon unbelievers. If she can do these things disunited, we tremble at what she would do united. There is, however, a movement in the Anglican church to form a Christian syndicate, and, in furtherance of the scheme, the editor of a Congregational journal of this city wrote to Cardinal Gibbons asking for his views on the subject. His reply is a specimen of religious avariciousness:

"Allow me to say, that I cannot conceive any practical plan for the ecclesiastical union of all who bear the Christian name which does not recognize

"1. Some authority, living and acting, that can definitly say what is or is not divine revealed truth, since upon Christ's revelation his church must be grounded.

"2. The obligation, strict and essential, of receiving in its entirety Chistian revelation, since Christ's work in giving a revelation would be, to say the least, useless, if each individual were left free to accept or reject that revelation, or any part of it, as his whim might dictate.

"3. That since Christ left a revelation he must hav left some authorized interpreter of it; otherwise it would be but a puzzle given to unaided ignorance, something which the 'unlearned and unstable' might 'wrest to their own destruction.'

"4. That since the mission of Christ's church is to 'teach all nations,' 'to observe all things, whatsoever he has commanded,' there must be some teacher teaching in Christ's name, and 'as one having authority,' to guide his people unerringly in the way of truth.

"In the Roman Catholic church of the sixteenth century, when Luther went out from her, these great requisits of Christian unity were found, and they are found as well in the Roman Catholic church of to-day; elsewhere I fail to find them.

"In separation from the see of St. Peter, the center of Catholic unity, I can see only discord. In all this broad land there is no one who longs for truly Christian union more than I do, no one who would labor more earnestly to bring about so happy a result.

"May the father of mercies grant that those 'other sheep,' for whose sake his divine son died, that are not yet of his fold, may speedily come home to it, that henceforth there may be 'one fold and one shepherd.'"

The cardinal is hungry for unity, if he can hav his own kind.

Every Christian must acknowledge some authority, activ and living, as to what is divine truth. That means the Roman Catholic church. No individual can reject any part of Christian revelation, but must accept it in its entirety. That means, accept what the Roman Catholic church teaches without question.

Every Christian must acknowledge the authorized interpreter of the scriptures, obediently and without question. That, again, means the Roman Catholic church.

Acknowledgment must also be made of one teaching in Christ's name, having authority. That means the pope.

In short, when every Christian becomes a Roman Catholic, says the cardinal, then unity will prevail—but not till then. Mr. Gibbons is very modest, but he is truthful. When the two wild beasts lie down together, one of them will be inside of the other. The Roman Catholic church will probably be the outside one.

The Letter to Henry George.

The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER feels complimented by the receipt of the following letter:

"PHILADELPHIA, Oct. 9, 1886.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I inclose you $5 to help circulate your admirable letter to Henry George in your issue of October 9th. Why not print a lot of slips inserting the advertisment of your paper and distribute them day of election?

"Very respectfully, E. M. DAVIS."

The treatment which our letter has received at the hands of Mr. George is unworthy of a man asking the votes of the people because he is a Reformer, because he is honest, because he is independent, because he stands for progress and for justice to all people. Mr. George's backbone, far from being sufficient to honestly answer the questions asked, is not even adequate to the simple courtesy of acknowledging their receipt. Perhaps, however, the Rev. Father McGlynn, or the Rev. Heber Newton, or Bishop Potter's Episcopalian monk, obtained possession of the letter and tore it up, so that Mr. George is not responsible for the discourtesy.

Editorial Notes.

THE activ Freethinkers in St. Lawrence county, N. Y., should see to it that George Z. Erwin does not get back to the legislature this fall. He is the fellow who pigeon-holed the petition to tax the churches, depriving the Assembly of a chance to vote on the question.

THE Freeman's Journal says of the "Holy scapular of Mount Carmel:" "The scapular of our lady lays storms at sea, and protects houses from fire, when other houses are burning around. When for the advantage of the person afflicted, the touch of the scapular, with faith and submission to God's will, cures painful maladies." Humbug!

THE editor of The World's Advance-Thought says: "Assuming Jesus to be the Soul-Center of the Unity which embraced Paul's soul we should understand in their literal sense (but giving them a spiritual application) the following words: 'There is neither bond nor free; there is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus' (Gal. i, 28)." This is indeed advanced thought!

"IN the school of Jesus and Mary," says a Catholic writer, "ignorance and knowledge hav a meaning very different from that affixed to them in the school of the world." This is very true. In the schools of the world ignorance means ignorance; in the school of Jesus and Mary it means unfamiliarity with the catechism and the other rubbish of Catholicism. In the schools of the world knowledge means knowing something useful; in the schools of Jesus and Mary it means the parrot-like ability to run a rosary and repeat a prayer. In Catholicism only the priests are educated, and they only that they may befool the people. For this reason parochial schools are nurseries of savagery.

WHEN the politicians distribute Herbert Spencer's works as campaign documents it shows that ideas are coming to the front—something unknown in any political campaign since the war closed. Henry George has reprinted the ninth chapter of Spencer's "Social Statics" and flooded the city with it. It is the most unique stump speech that the oldest inhabitant can remember. But how many of his Roman Catholic supporters does Mr. George suppose can understand it?

ON Monday night the benign Independent kept a force of eighteen young women compositors working all night to get out that "rat" sheet, and refused to pay them a single cent for the extra work involved. What a spectacle! This advocate of Christian thought and practice commits one of the four sins which cries to heaven for vengeance in defrauding the workers of their wages. It is a curious fact that the religious press in New York, as a unit, pays lower prices for work than any others in the business.—The Boycotter.

A CATHOLIC priest of Lawler, near New Hampton, Ia., has from his pulpit ordered a boycott of the New Hampton Tribune, because the editor of that paper has, as he puts it been honest enough to express his real opinion upon religious subjects. It is needless to say that the editor is an Infidel. The boycott, however, will not force the editor to keep still, for he announces his intention to read, and write, and print what he pleases. We advise him, in addition, to sue the priest for planning a conspiracy to injure his business. According to the decisions of New York judges, boycotting is a criminal offense.

A CORRESPONDENT, facetiously inclined, indulges himself in this wise: "A recent TRUTH SEEKER speaks of 'the best read man in that part of the state,' which, to one in an athletic mood, suggests that about the best red man in any state, if General Miles's experience counts anything, is Geronimo. The same issue remarks also that 'one swallow does not make a summer,' forgetting, perhaps, that general rules hav their exceptions; for instance, I hav known one swallow, as an initiativ, to make some err, and the some-erring continued until it landed them in an inebriate's untimely grave. Does this call for the chestnut bell?"

PROF. MONIER WILLIAMS, in an address before a Bible society at Oxford recently, said:

"To translate the Veda or the Koran into other languages the Hindoos and Mohammedans consider simply desecration. It is the sound and intonation of the sacred Sanskrit and of the sacred Arabic which is of primary importance and primary efficacy; the sense is merely secondary. Millions and millions who know nothing of Sanskrit are obliged to hear and repeat the Veda in Sanskrit, and millions who are wholly ignorant of Arabic are obliged to hear and repeat the Koran in Arabic. Think of what would happen if no Christian in any part of the world were allowed to hear, read, or repeat his Bible, except in Hebrew or Greek!"

The profcssor is partial. There are millions of English-speaking Christians who never read the Bible, and whose services are conducted in Latin, a language as unintelligible to them as Arabic is to an Irishman. "Think of what would happen if" there were no one on earth to tell the truth but Professor Williams!

THERE livs in Hull, England, a Nonconformist clergyman of the name of Hopper Joplin. General Booth, the Salvation Army leader, is another celebrity of that district. Henry Ward Beecher is also known over there. The Hull Critic has been denouncing these three gentlemen, and its editor is now under criminal prosecution for his words. Mr. Hopper Joplin is the complainant, General Booth being at present in Canada. The critic alleges that Booth cares for nothing but money; that Hopper Joplin has "as much religion in his soul as a shark has love for the human species;" and that Beecher is a heretic. The libelous article concludes with this poetical view of the three preachers:

"The devil went out one day
In search of an impious preacher,
And he wasn't very long on his way
Before he collared old Beecher.

Flushed with his grand success,
Satan, the champion 'copper,'
Rushed along in his dusky dress,
And collared old Booth and Hopper."

THE Toronto World says that "the clergy of all churches in Canada are more or less politicians," though with one exception they "use a certain reserve in making their opinions known." This exception is the Catholic clergy, of whom the World asserts that "the whole class seem imbued with the notion that the votes of Roman Catholics may, with perfect propriety, be exchanged for money received for the church. It is a usual thing," goes on the World, "for a parliamentary candidate to make a call on the bishop, offer him his compliments, and leave or send a sum of money, which the reverend gentleman disposes of as he wills. When Sir John and Sir David were distributing with lavish hands grants of land to colonization companies, a bishop repaired to Ottawa and returned home with an allotment. The reverend gentleman had no idea of putting settlers on the land or otherwise earning the grant. He took the property to a broker to be sold, but whether he was successful in getting rid of it history does not say. Another bishop was paid one thousand dollars for writing some letters to Irish journals in praise of Canada. Everybody who knows anything of the inner working of parties is aware that sums of money are constantly paid to clergy of the Roman Catholic church to secure votes, and that the votes are in many cases secured. It is not necessary to believe the story, though strongly asserted, that a local official was appointed on condition that he would pay a certain portion of his salary to the bishop of the diocese, and it is not an unheard-of circumstance for a Catholic to demand office or an increase of salary under a threat of complaining to the bishop!" These are very serious charges to make against the government and the church, but the worst of it is, they are no doubt true.

Letters from Friends.

WELLAND, ONT., Oct. 4, 1886.

FRIEND MAC: I did not expect you would publish my letter, but am glad you did so, as your reply places you before your readers in a clearer light, and not to be misunderstood. I was induced to write you more from what I had heard others say, and perhaps the letters of others on the subject of Anarchy had got a little mixed with editorials. I think the labor is not all lost.

Yours very respectfully, J. RAY.

ALTOONA, ILL., Oct. 11, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I would be glad if I could ask you a question through a column of your paper. The question is this, Can you giv a passage of scripture which tells us that woman has a soul? I deny that she has a soul, and want Bible for proof. In Genesis we read, "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul." It does not say "woman;" it says "man;" hence it must mean man and not woman. Again, we read that when Adam, the man, was sleeping God took out one of his ribs. "And the rib which the Lord God had taken from man made he a woman and brought her unto the man." A good job well done with poor material. In that whole chapter there is not even a hint about woman's soul. H. R. KEEL.

LYONS, KAN., Sept. 26, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I noticed a letter from Si Slokum on Prohibition. I do not think as he does on that subject. I hav been in whisky towns, and also in Prohibition ones, and think that Prohibition prohibits. But that is not really the question; it is, If it does prohibit, would it benefit? All of our laws are broken. Now, I am not a fanatic on this subject. I do not believe that whisky does any harm if used in moderation, but I think we can get along without it, and be just as healthy. Now, should we not, as Liberals, wishing to benefit our fellow-men, be willing to giv up this indulgence for the benefit of the thousands that it ruins?

Inclosed find $1.75—$1.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER six months, and 25 cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL.

ALBERT J. MILLS.

TRENTON, TEX., Sept. 23, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5, which use as directed.

The Liberals of Texas are jubilant in the hope of soon seeing and hearing W. S. Bell. Remsburg has nobly prepared the way for him, and I sincerely hope his labors will be crowned with success. Although bigotry and superstition hav a strong hold on the masses in many and most sections of my noble state, and they are being vigorously manipulated by the fanatical priesthood so as to retard in every way the advancement of Freethought, yet the light is beginning to dawn, and ere long the rats and bats will hie them to their holes. Cartoons are just the thing to carry thought to many who hav either dared not think or hav not taken the pains to think for themselvs. T. H. MANGUM.

PORTLAND, OR., Sept. 30, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: As straws show which way the wind blows, I wish to say for one that I indorse your sentiments on the Anarchists' trial, as editorially expressed. I don't see how anyone can take you to be an Anarchist from them. As good acts seem to be forgotten sooner than bad, that may be the reason why Mr. John Ray forgets your argument against the practicability of Anarchy as against the one that the seven Anarchists tried hav been wrongfully condemned, which to him appears to be a bad view for you to take. I think their conviction and sentence a very unjust one. I am glad there are some who may hav an influence that dare to say so, and giv their reasons why through the newspapers.

I don't wonder the "latitude" question bothers you.

Thought, to be free, must hav no bounds. Giv us more strong editorials, is my request. Success and a long life to THE TRUTH SEEKER and its editor, I say. I am no Anarchist, but like to see justice done. C. W. S.

AXTELL, KAN., Oct. 3, 286.

MR. EDITOR: A week ago our society received the one hundred books and tracts all right. We hav started them out on their missionary work. Each member of our society selected of his personal friends to induce to read, and selected such books to start as would be most apt to start in the right way to effect best results.

Now, in regard to a Liberal life insurance company, I think that the agent can make a living on the road soliciting, and that he would also sell books and take subscriptions for Freethought papers, and, if possible, hold debates at every town. And by a thorough canvass—such as an insurance agent will make—orthodoxy would get a shaking that would last for many a year.

We could say that we are afraid to trust Christians with money we leave to our heirs, and each one insured would be a thorough defender of our principles and a permanent member of our working force all the time. What we need is to organize and to get acquainted; hav it as it used to be in northern Indiana before the war, in regard to the underground railroad. We were known and knew others all along the line, and we knew just whom we could depend upon. When we get acquainted, which can only be by organization, the up-hill work will be done. I think that the $2.50 policy fees and the book sales will pay a man to take a horse and buggy and canvass state after state, and as he goes scatter tracts and offer to debate, and show the world that we mean war. Let us hear from everybody, and let the next Congress adopt a Secular Union Mutual Life Insurance, and if they refuse let THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator join in it, and if that fails I am in the field for it if THE TRUTH SEEKER will make the start. E. W. MINER, Sec. A. L. U.

P.S.—John Peck is at the head of your contributors; he just suits me. E. W. M.

PORTVILLE, Sept. 16, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 to pay for another year's subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Now, friend Macdonald, I would be glad to say something to you to let you know that I enjoy and appreciate THE TRUTH SEEKER very much in all its departments, but you hav it told you so many times every week that I think sometimes you must get sick of it, so I will do as the old fellow did with his winter-night prayer—you select the best letter from friends you hav received, and I will say, "Them's my sentiments." But, friend Macdonald, I think Brother Jas. B. Gray, in his letter of September 11th, speaks my sentiments, and is situated in some respects similarly to myself. We are nearly alone. But one other copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER comes to this office (Brother Coats's). I hav one thing that is very comforting—my wife and I agree in our skepticism. We hav raised one son and two daughters—the youngest twenty-four years old—and they are all good, intelligent truth seekers. J. L. BROOKS.

WEST UNION, IA., Sept. 19, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Last week the Liberals and a few of the orthodox people of West Union listened to three lectures given by the noted and widely known lecturer Mr. S. P. Putnam. The former listened with untold pleasure. The latter gave repeated grunts and groans of dissatisfaction during the lecture, which greatly annoyed those who attended for the purpose of listening.

West Union is a town consisting of about fifteen hundred inhabitants, and out of that fifteen hundred we can boast of six men whom we can recommend as good, sound Liberals. All but one of these were born Infidels. They hav seen the time, as thousands of others hav, when they could not get a book or paper in sympathy with their thoughts. Lucky for them they lived a little after the age of witchcraft and stake-burning. Of the rest of the fifteen hundred, about one-third support nine churches.

Mr. Putnam's lectures were the second series of lectures of that kind ever given here, Mr. Remsburg delivering the first about one year ago. Messrs. Remsburg and Putnam gave more than satisfaction to their few interested listeners. The only fault we can find is, there are so few of us, we cannot afford to listen to them oftener. ELLA N. SMITH.

JASPER, TENN., Oct. 11, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: It is only recently I became a reader of your valuable paper through the kindness of a friend who let me hav a lot of old issues. I see an article in the issue of May 2, 1885, from J. G. Malcolm; title, "How the Liquor Business Might Be Managed." In it Mr. Malcolm says that prohibitory laws when passed do not prohibit the manufacture or sale of liquors. We admit this to be a fact, but are we to giv up the struggle because we fail of success at the start? The world has had laws against theft and murder for over four thousand years, and yet men steal and kill. Mr. Malcolm thinks the government ought to take control of the manufacture and sale of liquor, and appoint good men to see that it is properly carried on. Upon the same hypothesis, the government ought to take control of the stealing and killing department and employ agents to steal from the people and to kill such citizens as might be troublesome to their neighbors. We think if the government takes charge of the liquor of the country it might at the same time appoint some agent to do the stealing and killing, and I would suggest that a preacher or priest take the position, as from his calling he would be the best judges of who are best prepared to go to kingdom come, or who are best able to be fleeced of their worldly possessions. AMOS L. GRIFFITH.

COLUMBIA RIVER, WASH. TER., Sept. 30, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: A case of religious bigotry and intolerance occurred here on Monday, September 27th.

Mr. John and Mrs. Johannah Andrasen, Liberals and subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER, hav had the misfortune within the last year to lose two of their children. The first died nearly a year ago, and was buried at this place. The other little one died a few days ago in the town of Astoria, at the mouth of the Columbia river. Of course, Mr. and Mrs. Andrasen, naturally enough, wished that the two little ones should lie beside each other, and immediately dispatched a friend to this place to make preparation for the funeral, and notify his friends and neighbors that the funeral would take place on Monday, the 27th. Everything seemed satisfactory, and no objection was raised until the party with the coffin arrived, and were slowly wending their way up the hill toward the little graveyard, when Mr. Andrasen was rudely accosted by a certain individual of this neighborhood, who gruffly informed him that he had brought a book to be read upon the occasion; that he had noticed a TRUTH SEEKER book in Mr. Scharnhorst's buggy, and if they were going to hav any Infidel speeches or TRUTH SEEKER book read at the grave, they were going to put a stop to it. Mr. Andrasen quietly but decidedly informed this commercial traveler of the house of St. Peter, Paul & Co. (the city, street, and number of the firm I cannot giv) that he should bury his child in the manner that suited him best. If they did not wish to listen to what was said at the grave, they need not attend the funeral, and if they raised further objections he would postpone the funeral, hav his other child disinterred, and move them both to the grounds of Mr. F. C. Scharnhorst, and bury them there in peace. Mrs. Andrasen was just as resolute as her husband. Finding that they could not intimidate him, they offered no further opposition, and the funeral took place. We hardly thought it possible that such an occurrence could take place in this community, but the preacher has lately worked into this neighborhood, and when the preacher once gains an entrance at the door, common sense, decency, and humanity fly out at the window. This coming from neighbors and supposed friends made it doubly hard for the bereaved to bear.

The little graveyard mentioned is about a mile from the home of Mr. F. C. Scharnhorst, and some time ago, in choosing a spot in the neighborhood as a place for burial purposes, the above-mentioned piece was selected, when Mr. Scharnhorst offered to giv fifty dollars toward it if it was made a free burying-ground, but the preacher came in and wanted it to be the property of the Dutch Reformed church, although there were three distinct classes willing to subscribe for its preparation and maintenance, the Dutch Reformed, the Lutheran, and the Freethinker. Mr. Scharnhorst, upon these conditions being presented to him, refused to hav anything to do with it. FREETHINKER.

HARWICH, MASS., Oct. 2, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad to notice that your estimable and talented correspondent, Jeremiah Hacker, occasionally furnishes an interesting article for the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Although he is greatly advanced in years, still he is as able "as in the days of yore" to strike powerful blows against superstition, bigotry, priestcraft, and all other evils practiced by mankind.

I hav before me a copy of The Pleasure Boat, published by "J. Hacker, owner, master, and crew," hailing from Portland, Me., and bearing date of 1846. It is divided off into several aparments, and under such headings as "Private Cabin," "Children's Cabin," "Intelligence Office," "Purgatory," etc., appropriate articles are placed.

It contains much matter of a reformatory character, and the productions of Mr. Hacker's pen plainly indicate that the editor in his little Boat was doing much at that time as a pioneer opening the way through channels that had long been closed by ignorance, bigotry, priestcraft, and similar abominations for larger craft to pass up into the regions covered with mental darkness, and do good work in diffusing the glorious light of Freethought. He then, as now, was on the side of wronged humanity, and labored for the elevation of the race to a higher plane of thought and action. May he long liv to wield his pen against the errors of mankind, which make countless numbers suffer both physically and mentally in this our world. J. H. PAINE.

CATHLAMET, W. T., Oct. 3, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I come again for a few minutes to tell you of our Wahkiakum Liberals. We (Mr. Albert and I) visited the lower part of the county, and called upon several families, and we are much encouraged with the progress Freethought is making in this county. We visited Mr. O. Nelson, an old subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and were royally entertained.

Mr. and Mrs. Nelson are outspoken in their views, and hav a little daughter, whom they are educating without the taint of superstition. Little Ella and her parents visited an orthodox neighbor a short time since, where grace was said at table. On her arrival home, she said to her father, "Papa, whom was Mr. Laurence talking to when he looked at his plate and got no answer?" Rather sensible query for a six-year-old girl.

We also visited Mr. J. P. Nelson, a subscriber of the Investigator. Here we spent a pleasant evening. While at Mr. O. Nelson's, a minister called, but found himself in such company that, after telling us he'd enjoy seeing us Infidels burning in hell, he took his leave. He thought it hard when the ladies asked questions about his dear "Lordy," as he called him. Mrs. Nelson asked him why his God didn't get married. I asked if he didn't think God a party to Adam's and Eve's crime in the garden, as he could foresee all things, and put the temptation in their way. He first said Yes; then said he didn't understand the question, and changed the answer to No. He did not just understand the Washington territory law, for he said it was necessary to swear by the holy book here, and was highly indignant when we proved the contrary. He thought he could not do much with us, so took his leave, shouting, "Glory to God!"

Inclosed find fifteen cents, for which please send "John's Way."

Our League has increased to thirty-five members.

MRS. S. F. ALBERT.

LEON, IA., Sept. 25, 286.

MR. EDITOR: About two years ago, we procured the services of John E. Remsburg to deliver three lectures—"Sabbath-Breaking," "Thomas Paine," and "False Claims." Mr. Remsburg is an image-breaker, but ere he is through he makes a strong defense of liberty, the Constitution, and our free schools, which are the basis to work on for a strong government and a higher civilization. About a year later we had Mr. W. F. Jamieson for three lectures. Mr. Jamieson builds better than he thinks, and makes friends and converts wherever he labors. This summer Mr. J. L. Andrew gave us an agreeable surprise by paying us a call, on his trip East. He gave us a short and pointed lecture on "Civilization and Christianity." Mr. Andrew is sarcastic, witty, and makes strong points. He did better than his friends supposed he could. He is a young man of growing timber, and with a few years' experience will make a formidable host within himself against superstition and priestcraft.

Next in order is our good captain, S. P. Putnam, who gave us a lecture on the "Demands of Humanity," on his trip to the far West. He was greeted with a good house. We had secured the hall in advance of the superstition party, and they had to call a halt just in the middle of their meeting for Mr. Putnam, which gave him a good advertisment. He fills the bill of a true orator. He "keeps close to the grass" down among the human family—among the ones he loves best. On his return trip he gave two ringing lectures, one on "Liberty, Science, and Humanity," the other, "The Glory of Infidelity." The lecture, "The New Heaven and Earth," at the school-house, was attended by a house-full of young men and women, and a few families of representativ Christians. One of our best laborers announced in the county papers that it was the best lecture she cver heard, and she has heard all of our men that hav been here. Mr. Putnam is well earning all the means provided him by the generous Liberal fund. Our only regret was that we could not do more for him. We hav denied our bodily wants to supply food for our minds. JOHN W. LONG.

P.S.—I omitted our lecture of the 11th, by C. Vincent, on "Usury." He makes war on our slave-making financial system, and it is truly a scholarly lecture. J. W. L.

NEW YORK, Oct. 11, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: We are constantly admonished, "Don't be a clam." I do not desire to be considered as such, yet by force of circumstances over which I hav no control, I am compelled to liv very much, not "very much like a whale," but very much like a clam in its shell; consequently I hav but little time to circulate to any extent among the few friends I already hav, and but few opportunities to form any new ones, and in this condition of affairs I apply to you and respectfully request that you will kindly permit me sufficient space in your columns to extend my right hand to Mr. John W. Truesdell, of Syracuse, and ask him to "shake."

I do this for the reason that I most heartily indorse every line of his article which appears on page 647 of your last issue (Oct. 9th), and I take the liberty of saying right here that I do not think that you were just either to yourself or to Mr. Truesdell in heading that article, "Sat Upon by Mr. Truesdell;" for I do not think that he or any of your friends has any desire or inclination whatever to assume so undignified—not to say arrogant and contemptible—a posture toward anyone, much less toward you, whom we all esteem for what you hav done in the past, and for what we hope for from you in the future; and we all respect you for your evident desire to "be just and fear no man." We are with you heart, hand, body, and soul to a certain limit, and if you cross that limit we say unto you, not in anger, but in sorrow, "Farewell."

I hav, on several occasions of late, been strongly tempted to send you a letter for publication, but hav refrained, for I hav not a particle of vanity, and wish to avoid notoriety or publicity as one would wish to avoid an evil of any kind; besides which I did not wish—do not wish—you to consider me one of those hebitudinous cranks who are possessed of "an insane desire to rush into print," and who always know just how a paper should be run in order to please everybody. The term crank is too heavy a one to be borne by a man of so small a "bore," of such small mental caliber, as myself; so if you do discover herein any indication of mental or moral obliquity, please apply the diminutiv, and let the term be cranklet, not crank; and hoping that you will not mistake the kindly feeling which prompts this brief letter,

I am, BENJAMIN F. CLARK.

WEST UNION, O., Oct. 7, E.M. 286.

MR. EDITOR: Our three days' Liberal camp-meeting closed on Sunday night, October 3d, with a splendid round of hearty applause from an intelligent audience. The lecture that night was "The Glory of Infidelity." No man or woman could hear it without being inspired by the heroic Infidel manhood and womanhood coming down to us as a rich inheritance through the dreary ages of the past, and pointing with glorious hope to the "New Heaven and Earth" of the rapidly coming future. Our orator's long array of Infidel heroes in all departments of human culture and civilization made us proud to bear the splendid name of Infidel, and those not yet in this glorious brotherhood which is working for the betterment of human conditions must hav felt some satisfaction in possessing the moral courage to be present, and giv such respectful, earnest, ladylike and gentlemanlike attention to our noble lecturer. We had "Universal Mental Liberty," and "American Democracy," and "New Heaven and Earth," and "The Church and School of the Future" in the previous lectures of this course, and so, for Friday night, the audience had been pretty thoroughly sifted of weak-kneed Christian stuff that dare not hear the truth without becoming "disgusted" and waltzing out. I read "Ingersoll and Jesus," and this cleared out a few remaining specks of trash and nothingness, and left Mr. Putnam a splendid audience of ladies and gentlemen of more than average intelligence.

The whole camp-meeting was a success. Our Infidel workers showed an increase of enthusiasm by an earnest determination to continue the war, and the people know more about our reformatory purposes than they did before. "American Democracy" must save our land, or else we fall under the cruelest, bloodiest Christian monarchy the world has ever known. If, as a republic, we sink beneath the barbarous cruelty of the church, it will be through contemptible moral cowardice, and because we do not deserve to be freed. May manhood help us to do the right! Mr. Putnam is a splendid specimen of the kind of men we will hav when the "New Heaven and Earth" hav been inaugurated—full of cheerfulness, hope, manly vigor, and an unbounded enthusiasm in the cause of humanity. His dress and manners are unexceptionable, and everything marks him a splendid gentleman of the new era of man, and heaven on earth. If you want a glorious old time, and a shaking up of the dry bones of orthodoxy, send for Putnam.

The orthodox churches are more bitter against us than they were last year. The preachers hold the dupes of superstition with a rigid grasp. Constant services in their God-houses prevailed during our meetings, and the cowardly priests refused fair and honorable discussion with Mr. Putnam. They are holding on with a kind of a death-grip, but when that breaks—then, oh, then! Their desperation is encouraging. It shows that they feel a sense of their danger. A structure resting on stupid ignorance only cannot much longer survive in this scientific and humanitarian age.

We had several additions to our Secular Society, and resolved to join the American Secular Union.

J. F. BEOK, secretary.

AN OPEN LETTER TO HELEN WILMANS.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Sept. 27, 1886.

DEAR MADAM: I hav just received your last Woman's World. You seem to hav entered upon a new world, one of which I cannot approve. I am sorry you hav left the realm of good (not God), as I regard it—woman's independence and individuality—for the realm of that shadow of shadows, metaphysics.

You may send my paper to some one who will appreciate your ideas; I cannot. And here I might stop, but I want to tell you that, while I recognize your right to publish your ideas, to enter upon any line of thought you believe to be true and applicable to the good of humanity, I believe you are following an ignis fatuus that is leading you away from solid ground, where you are needed so much; following one phase of that false philosophy which has filled the world with woe, by demanding faith and obedience and discouraging investigation; originating as a simple duality in nature by our savage ancestor as the only conceivable answer to the phenomena of sleep and dreams, of shadows, reflections, and echoes. First organized as fetichism, it has become, by countless ages of worship, a faculty of belief in our nature, and, though its blossoms at times are beautiful, it has proved itself a deadly nightshade.

Religion has been the curse of the world, and now, just as the people are catching glimpses of the pure sunlight of reason, every emancipated soul should assist in removing this noxious weed. Why cumbereth it the ground? Only as a hlding-place for the bats and owls of superstition. Away with them all, until every benighted soul shall feel the inspiring rays of the bright light of the morning.

Why was I surprised and grieved when Mrs. Wilmans, in her last paper, had no word of rebuke or protest at the gigantic crime perpetrated in her city in the name of law? Why, indeed, when she says: "Metaphysics, or mental science, denies not only the power of evil, but its very existence. It says, 'Good reigns supreme. Good (or God) fills all space, and therefore there is no room for anything else.' What, then, is evil? Simply a dream of what might be if good did not fill all space, and render the existence of evil impossible."

Why should she bother herself about something that does not exist? The poor souls of Chicago that are crying for bread might just as well be given a stone. It's all a mistake; they are not hungry. "The metaphysician denies the evidence of the senses." "It is simply impossible, then, that sin, sickness, and death should exist. Can God be sick?" And again: "All is of God, and evil is an impossibility. Why do I hav this disease? I do not hav it. It is impossible that I should be diseased. Is God diseased?"

Logic forever!
That beats my grandmother, and she was clever!

O absurdity! thy name is metaphysics!

Throw (meta)physic to the dogs; I'll none of it.

Yours sorrowfully, A. L. BALLOU.

BENWOOD, W. VA., Sept. 11, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith inclose $2, for which please giv me credit on my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

THE TRUTH SEEKER of this date is at hand, and the illustration on the first page is a very appropriate one. It illustrates a truth the importance of which most people do not realize and appreciate as fully as they should in criticising works of art and objects in nature. Beauty or its opposit is, for the most part, in the eye of the beholder, and, as it reads at the bottom of the illustration, "Dirty minds see dirty images."

No two minds see things just alike, nor does even the same mind see things just alike at different times or in different moods. In short, each one sees according to the scope and character of his mental vision, and that forms the standard by which he is apt to judge of what he sees around and about him.

Mr. Heston is "away up" in pictures, and I hav enjoyed many a laugh over the more comical ones of his production. I want to see the pictures continued, though I hope your artist will not be too hard on the Christians, for the sake of those among them who may be sincere in their belief. I hav no doubt it wounds the feelings of the more pious ones to hav their religion caricatured as is done in some of THE TRUTH SEEKER illustrations. While I am well aware that those Christians who respect the rights and feelings of Liberals are few and far between, yet I believe it is better to do unto them as we would be done by than to do unto them as they do by us.

Why cannot some of the many isolated Liberals, such, for instance, as Miss Gibson mentions in her letter, come together and form coöperativ colonies or societies to engage in farming, or manufacturing, or both? There might be one or more of such coöperativ associations formed in each state in the Union, which, if properly conducted, would secure to each member the full fruits of his labor and enable him to purchase everything he wants at nearly first cost, besides affording the social advantage desired by isolated Liberals.

There is room in the virgin forests of West Virginia for colonists and home-seekers, and good land can be had cheap, so I would advise such Liberals as may be seeking homes and who do not wish to emigrate to the far West, to form a coöperativ colony and come to West Virginia. There are some coöperativ colonies being formed in this state now which promis to be successful; none of them, however, as far as I know, are composed of Liberals.

CHARLES BURSEE.

NEW YORK, Sept. 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot longer withhold my appreciation of the stand you take regarding Freethought in general and the popular mad cry against Anarchists in particular. It is sad to reflect that among Infidels and so-called Freethinkers and Liberals so much illiberality is found, as many articles from your correspondents prove. One cannot be much of a Liberal who wants to forbid to another man the right to speak and proclaim his opinion. Mr. Malcolm and others will do well to read the Declaration of Independence: "That to secure these rights [life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness] governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructiv of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

The Constitution of the United States says that "Congress shall make no laws respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech; or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances." This article is really of no effect at all, except for Knownothingdom to vaunt this so-called "free country," because to the contrary thereof any state in the Union can and does act as it pleases.

If after the word, "Congress," "or any state" were inserted, "shall make no laws," then freedom granted might be enforced, but as now, it is of little value. I am an independent reader and observer of newspapers, and can read between the lines, make allowances for the popular prejudices to which they cater, and then form my own opinion. I hav found that the lower, poorer class, whenever discontented, is by the police—the tools of wealth—forbidden to assemble publicly—as if the public places were owned by the police. If the people persist in assembling to peaceably discuss their grievances, then the police command them to disperse, and if not obeyed will club them. The police were the aggressors years ago in Tompkins square, and lately in Chicago and Milwaukee; the police were the rioters really. Without the least cause or provocation, and to the contrary of the freedom to assemble granted by the Constitution of the United States, they clubbed and drove the people away.

We ought to be thankful that some courageous men are found willing to assert their rights and remonstrate even at the sacrifice of their lives against such injustice and against such laws.

I am simply a Freethinker; belong to no associations of any kind; hav had to labor all my life; and saved by abstaining from the use of tobacco and liquors enough to keep my old age in peace, and free from want. Therefore in what I may say or write I can hav no personal interest.

We hav such a mass of nonsensical laws of all kinds (for an example read "Marriage and Divorce Laws," page 154 in the World's Almanac, 1886, as a part of them only) that I do not wonder that we hav Anarchists. I do not think that we could be much worse off without any laws at all than we are at present. All the laws now, with the exception of a few established only lately, are for the protection of the wealthy and educated class, and of monopolists and banks, and against the poorer class, who really need protection the most. This state of affairs becomes more and more known to the downtrodden laboring class, and they organize into Knights of Labor, Socialists, Communists, Nihilists, and Anarchists for the purpose of a change in our society, laws, and customs. The organization known as the Knights of Labor is an intolerant tyrant, and professes to be an enemy to Socialism, but slavishly submits to the behest of the church. What good can come of it?

Then, we hav excited disputations about Prohibition. Now, I do not comprehend how any Liberal, less a Freethinker, can vote for that party. Just read its platform of 1884, in which it acknowledges "almighty God as the rightful sovereign of all men, from whom the just powers of the government are derived, and to whose laws human enactments should conform as an absolute condition of peace, prosperity, and happiness." Right to the contrary of the Declaration of our Independence.

Our greatest evils might be rectified in a comparativly short time without any great evolution, much less revolution, in this land, by and with the ballot. The laboring and middle classes constitute the great majority of the people; let them establish a progressiv income tax, the most just tax of any. It will exempt the poor, and will bear only on the rich well able to pay. I would hav it like this: an increase of one per cent with every thousand dollars income, $990 to be exempt; $1,000 to pay tax $10; $2,000 to pay $20 plus $10, equaling $30; $3,000 to pay $30 plus $30, equaling $60; $4,000 to pay $40 plus $60, equaling $100; and so on up to ninety or ninety-five per cent of the incomes. The more one should hav to pay, the better able he would be to pay. Besides this tax, hav a ground tax, cultivated land to pay no more than the wild, uncultivated land next to it. So lots in cities should be taxed only; no building or improvements of any kind should be taxed in city or country. These two taxes would in time equalize our wealth, stop speculation in land, stimulate building and all kinds of improvements, bring down rents, and increase the food supply. What prejudice against these two taxes could operate the majority of the people I am not able to see. Let the leaders of the several organizations unite on these taxes, and they will sooner reach their aim than separated as they now are.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Life's Sunny Side.

What—you are dull to-day?
In a sad mull to-day!
Up and be social and stirring, I pray,
Why so lugubrious?
Take a salubrious
Walk, and we'll talk, for I've something to say.

Verily, verily,
Things will go merrily
When you are merry and brave.
But if not cheerfully
Tempered, but tearfully,
Life is a tyrant, and you are its slave.

If you go wilfully,
However skilfully
Nursing your moods and your delicate whims,
Life will be dumb to you,
All things will come to you
Touched by a shadow that saddens and dims.

Life has two sides to it,
Take the best guides to it,
Look at the best and the brightest, my friend.
Be a philosopher,
Don't look so cross over
Matters you never can alter or mend.

Look not so dismally
Down the abysmally
Dark—hanging over the precipice brink.
Worst of all bias is Hypochondriasis—
Sunshine is healthier than shadow, I think.

If you would drive away
Gloom, and would hive away
Honey-like peace in your innermost cell,
Work—like the humble bee,
Soft let your grumble be;
Burn your own smoke, and the world will go well.

The Little Smiths.

There are five of them—Freddie, Lottie, Katie, Dan, and baby Edith. They are bright little children, and smart as whips, every one of them. They liv at Buzzard's Bay, and are as healthy and handsome as good, strong constitutions, the sun, and wholesome food and good air can make them. Fred and Dan hav little gardens of their own, and they raise beans, corn, pumpkins, squashes, cucumbers, and potatoes. Dan is not more than seven or eight years old, and Fred may be about twelve. Lottie is nine, I think, and Katie is five, and baby Edith is, may be, two and a half. They go to school, all but the baby, and are quick to learn. They all can work, and it is very amusing to see even little Edith trying to clear up the table after meal time, and begging—the little tot!—to wipe the dishes.

Fred has to go some distance to school, so he takes a lunch along and does not come home till the close of the afternoon session. He is very honorable, is Fred, and when eating his lunch in his aunt's garden in the summer-time, and the boys come and tease him to get them some of his aunt's grapes or pears, he will look at them indignantly, and say, "Do you suppose I'm going to steal!" "Oh, she never'll know," the boys say. "But I shall know, and I don't want any such trouble on my conscience."

Each little Smith has his own place for his own things, and neither one would think it at all right to meddle with the others' belongings without leave, even if they are brothers and sisters.

Don't they hav any faults? you ask.

Of course they do; they are not perfect children, by any means. They cry and kick and get cross, at times, just like other boys and girls. They are roguish, too. Fred is quite a naturalist, and likes to dissect frogs and fishes after they are dead. He has a great curiosity to inspect bugs, birds, and beetles, but he was never known to rob a nest or hurt a bird.

I'll tell you what he did once, not long ago. He collected a lot of living crickets, and deposited them in his sister Lottie's bed-room. Well, after she went to bed, one night, she began to cry: "Mamma! mamma! Oh, dear! oh, dear! I can't go to sleep!" Her mother went to her room—and no wonder she couldn't sleep! It was "C-r-e-e-k! c-r-e-e-k! c-r-e-e-k!" on the right and on the left, under the bed and over the bed, under the chairs, under the stand, everywhere! The room seemed full of crickets, and every one pouring forth his shrieks to the best of his ability. It was "Chirp, chirp! crick, crick, crick!" and you never heard such an uproar of crickets in all your life. The whole family came to the room, and if there had been very near neighbors, they would hav come, too.

"Who has done this?" inquired the mamma Smith.

Fred, the culprit, stood by laughing.

"Why, don't you like it? I do," he said. "I think it is fun."

"You might hav put them in your own room, then," sobbed Lottie.

Of course there was hunting for crickets, but it was more than one day before all of the crickets were dislodged.

Of course it was naughty in Fred, not to collect so many crickets, but, after he had collected them, to put them in Lottie's room to annoy her and keep her awake. I don't think Dan is quite so roguish, but he will learn to be, probably, as he grows older. He studies hard in school, and has great pride in always keeping at the head of his class.

Well, they are bright children, and some time when I hav more leisure I will tell you more of the little Smiths. S. H. W.

The Beginning.

"Giv me a half-penny, and you may pitch one of these rings, and if it catches over a nail I'll giv you threepence." That seemed fair enough; so the boy handed him a half-penny and took the ring. He stepped back to the stake, tossed the ring, and it caught on one of the nails.

"Will you take six rings to pitch again, or threepence?"

"Threepence," was the answer, and the money was put in his hand. He stepped off, well satisfied with what he had done, and probably not having an idea that he had done wrong. A gentleman standing near him watched him, and now before he had time to look about and rejoin his companions, laid his hand on his shoulder.

"My lad, this is your first lesson in gambling."

"Gambling, sir?"

"You staked your half-penny and won six halfpence, did you not?"

"Yes, I did."

"You did not earn them, and they were not given to you; you won them just as gamblers win money. You hav taken the first step in the path; that man has gone through it, and you can see the end. Now, I advise you to go and giv his threepenee back, and ask him for your half-penny, and then stand square with the world, an honest boy."

He had hung his head down, but raised it quickly, and his bright, open look as he said, "I'll do it," will not soon be forgotten. He ran back, and soon emerged from the ring, looking happier than ever. He touched his cap and bowed pleasantly, as he ran away to join his companions. This was an honest boy, and doubtless made an honorable man. —Morning Star.

Fables for the Times.

A Crow with a morsel of cheese in her beak was accosted by a hungry Fox, who begged her to sing, remarking that a beautiful voice must accompany so fair a form. The vain bird at once dropped the cheese and the Fox hastened to seize it. But alas! it was Limburger, and one smell overcame the thief, whose dying agonies were hightened by the Crow's executing "In the Gloaming."

Moral: This little Fable shows that the innocent often develop surprising strength in unexpected quarters.

THE TWO DOGS.

Two dogs one day went lion hunting, one of them being a smart dog with a classical education and the other being very ignorant and unsophisticated. Pretty soon they struck the track of a Lion, and the educated Dog started off in the direction of the royal beast, while his ignorant companion, making an absurd mistake, took the back track and started off in the opposit direction. In a few minutes the educated Dog was serving as an inanimate free lunch for an enormous Lion, while the ignorant Dog escaped unhurt.

Moral: This Fable teaches that classical lore should be plentifully sprinkled with practical knowledge.—Life.

Correspondence.

VALLEY FALLS, KAN., Oct. 3, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Encouraged at seeing my first letter in print, I will try to write a second. I think THE TRUTH SEEKER is improving all the time. It arrives here on Saturday or Sunday, and we all hav a hearty laugh at Watson Heston's work on the first and last pages. There is a minister in Manhattan, Kan., where my two sisters are attending college, who says nothing that is ridiculed can stand long. Christianity surely will fall then.

S. P. Putnam paid Valley Falls a visit and delivered four lectures in the latter part of August—three at the Opera House at night, and one at the park in the afternoon. We attended them all but the one in the park. It rained and we could not go. We were very well pleased with his lectures and hope he will come again. Papa and mamma purchased his picture and his pamphlet entitled "Why Don't He Lend a Hand?" and other Agnostic poems. I think it is as good poetry as I ever read. We hav read his books entitled "Golden Throne" and "Waifs and Wanderings," and think them very interesting. Papa bought Ingersoll's forty-three lectures complete. I hav started to read it through, and think it is the best book I ever read. I think it would do a person more real good to read one of Ingersoll's lectures than to read the filthy old Bible through. I started to read it through once, but didn't get very far until I decided that it was too silly to spend any time on. The board of this district hav hired a religious school-teacher again this winter, and I am very sorry. Their senseless prayers to an invisible deity of whose existence no one knows make me sick. My studies are history, arithmetic, grammar, geography, and spelling. History is my favorit study. I will inclose my card. Wishing you every happiness, I remain, Yours truly, E. HORTENSIA HARMAN.

[Thanks for the above interesting letter, and the accompanying pretty card. We hope to hear from Hortensia again.—ED. C.C.]

THE RISE OF
INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY
From Thales to Copernicus.
By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."
"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."
Octavo, 458 pp. PRICE, $3.50.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

Poetry.

Parson Joe and the Judgment Day.

Parson Joseph was black, but he had a good knack
Of preaching to converts and sinners;
He'd shout and they'd sing and make the walls ring,
And forget to go home to their dinners.

Year after year Joe kept them in fear
Of customs unrighteous and evil;
Said, "Brudders, all mind, and sistern, be kind;
Or you'll go to the home of the debil."

Parson Joseph one day heard an old brother say
Opposition had sprung up in preaching—
That a stranger had come the neighbors among,
And a new gospel doctrin was teaching.

"Adventism" he taught; Joe's followers caught
In their minds new tidings of Gabriel,
And believed he'd soon blow to let the world know
Earth's fixtures were growing unstable.

When Sabbath day shone Joe stood quite alone
In his church all deserted and dreary,
For his flock looked in vain till closing time came,
Then retired down-hearted and weary.

The stranger's new call drew his followers all
Away from their ancient profession;
Joe took it all in and thought it a sin
To relinquish the right of possession.

He was shrewd to the core, his age was threescore,
He had learned human nature is freaky—
Seeks changes to make and friends will forsake
As do rats an old ship that is leaky.

"I'll hab 'em all back as sure as I'm black,"
Said Joe to a near faithful neighbor;
"I'll try dis queer preachin' and new-fangled teachin', Den go on undisturbed in my labor."

Next Sabbath Joe went to hear the Advent—
Prostrated himself in devotion;
His people all shouted to see how he scouted
Old things for the new gospel notion.

Converted anew, Joe's followers flew
To his old place of worship to hear him;
His opponent in terror pronounced him in error,
Refusing to hear or go near him.

In fierce opposition and crude superstition
For members they long did compete;
Both strove hard to show that soon Gabriel would blow
And leave sinners out in the heat.

But Joseph could see that a prophet to be
Would giv him high standing and prestige,
So he told it around when Gabriel would sound
And got in ahead with the message.

Said he: "In September—now, friends, all remember—
The twentieth about, I should say,
In de clouds of de sky de Lord you'll espy
Comin' down to de great judgment day.

Now let us prepare white garments to wear,
And go forth to meet the bridegroom;
We'll all go together be it good or bad weather;
I thinks he'll come down about noon."

White robes were prepared, but their feet were all bared
To giv them a lighter ascension;
They met on a hillside where grass it had dried
To enjoy Parson Joseph's invention.

In vain did they wait in uncertain state
Of mind, for no Gabriel appeared;
And, as time had grown cheap, they all fell asleep,
So remained until evening had neared.

But boys were on hand, and with quick firebrand
Encircled the hillside with fire,
Expecting to see the whole company flee
And take a position much higher.

Outside of the crowd Joe, snoring aloud,
Was wrapped in profoundest repose,
As the slow-creeping fire climbed higher and higher
And crackled between his bare toes.

At the first twinge of heat Joe sprang to his feet,
And, seeing the grass all aglow,
Thought Satan the sneak had caught them asleep
And sent them to regions below.

He shouted aloud to his sleep-loving crowd,
"Say, niggers, awake! don't you know
Dat Satan has caught us? New preachin' has brought us
Just where I expected you'd go."

Then bounding through smoke, Joe instantly broke
Away from the sable ascenders,
And seeing the game when clear of the flame,
Never mingled again with pretenders.

WILLIAM ERECKSON.

Stray Scraps.

John O'Mally, of Dallas county, Iowa, is one hundred and twelve years old, has chewed tobacco and smoked since he was a boy, takes a nip of old Kentucky when he feels like it, and says he never recited more than three verses at a time in Sunday-school, and did not go to sea as a cabin-boy.—Boston Globe.

Mrs. Mary Hayes Gilbert, says the Boston Globe, of Gloucester, Mass., celebrated her one-hundredth birthday September 8th. She retains all her faculties, with a remarkable memory of events. She is only a little hard of hearing. She is a devout Christian, of the Unitarian order. It is not stated whether she used tobacco, took a nip of old Kentucky, snuff, or other stimulants or sedatives, but it is recorded that she repeated the "Cradle Hymn" learned at the tender age of five years. It is presumable that the long life of John O'Mally is attributable to smoking and spirits, while Mrs. Gilbert's is to be set down to total abstinence from these stimulants. Consistency, thou art a jewel!

Rev. Geo. O. Barnes, the mountain evangelist of Kentucky, says that he has made his trip around the world, with his wife, son, and two daughters, entirely on faith. He had no plan when he set out but to preach—no invitations from abroad, no promises of support, no acquaintances, even, in the countries he visited. Yet he made the journey and wanted for nothing!—Cleveland Plaindealer. A regular deadbeat of the first water, possessed of the effrontery to brag over it, and call it "faith!" An ecclesiastical tramp, with his family included, who had they been Infidels would probably hav turned up in the lock-up! But because he was good at begging and tramped like his Lord and master he is a citizen of good repute, a Christian gentleman, and a practical believer in the faith doctrin. Hurrah for Christian tramps!

A threatening storm cloud alarmed the worshipers at a colored camp-meeting at Green Camp, O., one Sunday, and in their hurry to get away thirty-two buggies were totally wrecked. And yet the preacher was then exhorting his hearers: "Beloved bredren, hav faith in God, trust in God; his tender mercies are over all his works." But, you see, friends, none of them believed it. And yet these Christians curse us heretics because we say it is all a farce; but when emergencies arise how practically they prove the truth of our belief and the falsity of their own!

ELLA E. GIBSON.

Obituary.

DIED.—In New Milford township, Pa., Sept. 29, 1886, Mrs. Olive Grinnell, aged about 59 years.

This brave woman who has just gone to her rest was mourned by the little band of Liberals here with true sorrow. As mother, wife, and steadfast friend, her place will not easily be filled. Coming from the humble walks of life, she knew how to pity the outcast and suffering. No waif, made homeless by circumstances, was turned away from her fireside, and no appeals for help from the destitute were unregarded. A seeker after truth, to find it was to accept it. She questioned not of the future life. This world was all that concerned her, and to do her work well in this life was her only desire.

Few women are so worthy of imitation as this fearless one just departed. With few advantages in early life, she worked her way, alone, out of the thraldom of the church, into the broad, clear light of the religion of humanity, allowing neither popularity, honors, nor friendship to interfere with her convictions of right and truth. And when called to solve the problem of a future existence, she approached the silent shore with firmness and resignation, murmuring not at the inevitable, for death, at the worst, was to her but a sweet, unbroken rest. And, so sustained, she died

Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

With beautiful consistency, which makes her memory doubly dear to us, she requested that no orthodox services should be rendered at her funeral. So, in accordance with her request, appropriate ceremonies were conducted by Joshua Burrows, of Gibson, Pa. Oh, if the timid and weak in our ranks would only dare to follow the example of this courageous sister, and positivly forbid at their funerals the orthodox mummery which, in life, they laughed at and heartily despised!

Large numbers came from the surrounding country to look for the last time on the face of one who had so often served them in times of sorrow. "She was to me a mother," came from many a trembling lip. But all was over at last, and we laid her tenderly to rest in her lonely, narrow bed.

A sadness deep is ours, and tears will start,
That one we loved has fallen by the way.
We ill could spare her, for so few stand forth,
As she, for truth, and courage grand display.

Scorned by the bigot, that in reason's light
She stood arrayed, from superstition free;
Hoping beyond for neither bliss nor pain;
This life well spent, her immortality.

As she drew near the mystic, silent sea,
"I am so weary, let me go," she said.
"Hang up my shield and buckler; I hav done
My work. I greet the unknown without dread."

And so we laid her quietly to rest
Where wild flowers bloom, 'mid song of bird and bee,
When autumn's radiance down the hillside streamed,
And all who stood there said, "'Tis well with thee!"

The American Institute Fair.

The fifty-fifth exhibition of the American Institute was opened Sept. 29th by an address from William Rutter, Esq., of the board of trustees. Ample as the grounds of the Institute are, occupying the entire block from Sixty-third to Sixty-fourth street, and from Second to Third avenues, they are inadequate to accommodate one-half the applications for space. Every accommodation is afforded by the trustees for refreshments inside the building, so that parties spending the day in the building will not be under the necessity of going out. Open evenings until 10 P.M.; music afternoon and evening. Persons coming to New York and going away without visiting the Institute will miss one of the most useful and instructiv places of resort in the city. We trust the time is not far distant when prejudice shall yield to popular opinion and the fair be opened Sundays for the benefit of the mechanics, the real authors of the industrial works, benefiting the Institute to detriment of the rum-shops.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS

is a regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove. He has for twenty years treated exclusivly all diseases of the Sexual Organs, in the cures of which he stands preeminent SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in maturer years, causing night emissions by dreams, loss of sexual power, rendering marriage improper and unhappy, etc., are cured permanently by an outside application in sixty days. NO STOMACH MEDICIN USED. It is one of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries, which is entirely unknown to the medical profession. It is not a catch-penny get up, such as a pad, belt, pastille, nor magnetic appliance, but simply a medicin to be applied externally on the parts affected, which cures by absorption. Send five 2-cent stamps for his "Private Counselor," giving full information. Address Dr. R. P. Fellows, Vineland, N. J. and say where you saw this advertisment.

N. B.—Dr. Fellows begs leave to say that he is an Infidel of the most pronounced character. Bro. Liberals, your patronage is solicited.

OF

BY LEWIS G. JANES.

This book treats of the natural evolution of the Christian religion, its historical antecedents in Palestinian Judaism and Roman Paganism; investigates the history of the founder of Christianity in the light of the latest scientific criticism of the New Testament; shows that the true story of the Man Jesus, and his genuin teachings are separable from the later legendary accretions which hav confounded him with the mythical Christ, and traces the natural development of Christian dogma and ecclesiastical institutions. Complete references and full index. 320pp. 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price $1.50.

"SHOPPEL'S MODERN HOUSES" No. 3.
(Just Published, July 1, 1886) CONTAINS:
A colored frontispiece showing the modern style of painting.
A cardboard supplement, ingeniously drawn and colored, to supply all the necessary pieces for constructing a model house, with plain directions for putting them together.
While the supplement affords both old and young the greatest amusement, it is more than a toy. It is, in fact, a most practical lesson in Architecture; a perfect, scaled model of one of our most popular designs, so exact that it is useful to builders.
55 New Designs for Residences (cost varying from $500 to $15,000).
2 New Designs for Barns.
1 New Design for a Chapel.
Drawings and description of a model Kitchen (by Maria Parloa) and a perfect Cistern.

News of the Week.

BURNHAM WARDWELL, the prison reformer, died Oct. 3d, aged 68.

LUCY PARSONS, wife of Albert Parsons, the condemned Anarchist, lectured in New York last Sunday. She had an audience estimated at 1,000.

CHARLESTON, S. C., had another sharp shock of earthquake on the 15th. Doors and windows rattled and some plastering fell, but no serious damage was done.

THE strike among the employees of Armour, the Chicago pork packer, ended last Monday in a failure, the men going back to work at the ten hour day.

M. DE LESSEPS, the noted French civil engineer, will be present at the unveiling of Bartholdi's statue of Liberty on Bedloe's Island, New York harbor, Oct. 28th.

HENRY GEORGE lectured last Sunday on "Moses." He held that the Mosaic law was the most beneficent of statutes, and that Moses was an able political economist.

WM. K. VANDERBILT has just launched at Wilmington, Del., a half-million dollar steam pleasure yacht. Her dimensions are: Length, 285 ft.; beam, 32 ft.; depth, 21 ft.; displacement, 1,300 tons.

THROUGH the rascality of John B. Mannix, the defaulting assignee of the defaulting Archbishop Purcell, ex-Gov. George Hoadly, of Ohio, a Freethinker, will lose $54,000 as one of Mannix's bondsmen.

THE Rev. B. F. Bowen, preacher, temperance exhorter, and former right-hand man of Francis Murphy, was sent to the workhouse at Cleveland, O., last week, for drunkenness and disorderly conduct.

AT the Episcopal church convention at Chicago last week the proposition to change the name of that church to the American Catholic church was seriously discussed. After a hard fight it was defeated.

THE proprietors of the New York Sun hav just paid a bill of $500 against the Grant family for undertaker's services in embalming the body of General Grant. The general's family repudiated the debt before it was paid, but now offer to reimburse the Sun.

THE Brooklyn Presbytery, having found the Rev. Mr. Staunton guilty of ministerial conduct toward a woman not his wife, has now forgiven him. He will not be expelled from the ministry, nor even temporarily suspended, and endeavors will be made to induce Mrs. Staunton to take him back.

THE Knights of Labor are in convention at Richmond, Va. Last Sunday many of them took advantage of the occasion to listen to the Rev. John Jasper, D.D., the distinguished colored divine, who holds, with the scripture, that "the sun do move." General Master Workman Powderly attended St. Joseph's Catholic church.

THE town of Sabine Pass, Tex., was nearly washed away by a tremendous storm on the 13th. The town is near the mouth of the Sabine river, and was overwhelmed with great waves that drowned people by the scores. It is thought that the death roll will reach two hundred. Great suffering prevails, and relief is asked for.

JANITOR TITUS, of the Methodist Institute at Hackettstown, N. J., has been found guilty of murdering and outraging Tillie Smith, the kitchen-maid. There is doubt about the justice of the verdict, and it is probable that Titus will hav a new trial. He is said to be a very religious man, and spends his time in jail poring over the Bible.

THE political situation in New York is interesting. The Labor party hav nominated Henry George for mayor; Tammany Hall and the County Democracy hav united on Abram Hewitt as a candidate for that office, and the Republicans hav put Theodore Roosevelt in the field. All the candidates hav free trade tendencies. The Irving Hall Democracy will support Henry George. The campaign is a lively one.

THE charge against Monsignor Capel, the eminent Catholic priest and lecturer, is that he is living with another man's wife on a ranche in California. He claims that his relations with the woman are merely those of tutor to her son, whose education he has taken in charge. The woman is a wealthy Catholic who has quarreled with her husband, and the general belief is that Capel is after her money for either himself or the church.

Odds and Ends.

MOTHER: "And do you think the good Lord will look out for my son, who is on the vasty deep?" Parson: "Pardon me, Mrs. Harper, I never talk shop outside of the church."

THEY call it a romantic marriage in Minnesota when a couple of the neighbors get the bride's father into a back room and sit on him to prevent his interrupting and breaking up the wedding.

"AURELIA, darling." "Yes, Arthur." "You know we are soon to be married." "Yes." "And we should learn to be economical in small things." "Yes." "Hadn't you better turn down the gas?"

A FREE fight occurred in the vestry of one of our churches the other night. A copy of Burton's edition of the "Arabian Nights" got into the Sunday-school library, and each of the four deacons wanted to take it home first.

NO St. Paul relics for him: "Hav you heard of that interesting case down East of a woman who was cured of paralysis by the miraculous power of a relic of St. Paul?" "Yes, I hav; but I'm from Minneapolis, and I wouldn't touch a relic of St. Paul with a ten-foot pole."

HE was riding in the suburbs with his best girl, and they passed a stable in the door of which stood a couple of calves. "See," said the young lady, "those two cute little cowlets." "Those are not cowlets, Araminta; they are bullets." And the procession moved rapidly away.

A PHILADELPHIA religious weekly informs its readers that Noah's wife was turned into a pillar of salt. If its readers are not aware of the fact that Methuselah was thrown into the lion's den, and Adam was swallowed by the whale, it should lose no time in imparting the information.

"WHAT pretty children you hav," said the new minister to the proud mother of three little ones. "Ah, my little dear," said he, as he took a girl of five up into his lap, "are you the oldest of the family?" "No, ma'am," responded the little miss, with the usual accuracy of childhood, "my pa's older'n me."

A WESTERN editor, in referring to an esteemed contemporary, says: "His slanderous soul is imbued with the electric fire of hell; his black heart emits sulphurous fumes, till his whole nature is absorbed in one homogeneous mass of hellishness." There's brilliant and varied talent for you, showing that the true journalist is born, not made. A man might attend the Yale College school of journalism two hundred and fifty years and not learn to write that way!

"YES, the Lord has sorter seemed to smile on me this year," said the deacon as he stuck the corn-cutter into the fence. "A big apple crop—heaps of 'taters—fine yield of wheat and oats—big hay crop, and corn A No. 1. Yes, I feel as if I had been blessed." Just then the deacon's boy came from the house and whispered something in the old man's ear. "Two dollars for a pair of shoes!" shouted the deacon as he raised his head. "You tell your mother she can't hav no two-dollar shoes. We'll be lucky if we git through the coming winter without having to sell the hosses to buy meat and flour."

"YOU'LL be glad to hear, John," said a farmer to his shepherd one day, "that the University of St. Andrew's has made our minister a doctor." "I am naeways surprised at that," said the shepherd. "Mair than twenty years syne he cured my wife o' colic. I think he should hae been made a doctor long syne."

DEDICATED TO MR. VAN ORDEN.

Not entered according to act of Congress.

Truth's day has dawned, yet the darkness
Broods over Boonton like night,
And the power of using their reason
From the people has taken its flight.

I see the light of a badge-pin
Gleaming o'er Jersey's dark vales,
And Reynolds the tales of the Bible
For the people tries to unveil.

But a feeling of venomous fury,
Strangely akin to the form,
But resembling madness only
As the blizzard resembles the storm,

Comes as he reads them a story,
A simple and innocent lie,
Such as soothes the restless feelings
Of a child in the nursery.

Not from the grand master liar,
Munchausen, so absurdly sublime,
But foolish, unbelievable nonsense,
Was the story he read them that time.

They'd believed the tale since their childhood,
Of Adam, and what that nap cost,
And of all the genius for mischief
Contained in the rib that he lost.

Like a new tale the old one he told them,
And some fun of it tried to suggest;
But they called him a wicked blasphemer,
And howled for his speedy arrest.

Kindly he told them how foolish
'Twas believing those tales without doubt,
And as showers from clouds of summer,
The brickbats flew wildly about.

They bore him away through the long street,
Feeling not quite at his ease,
For the air was full of strange noises,
To Toothache, the Justice of Peace.

They repeated the tale as he told it,
Which unquestioning they must receive,
And it struck them just like conviction,
'Twas terribly hard to believe.

For stirring up thought in the people
Old Toothache a fine did collect,
And loaned to the justice of Jersey
What he had of a small intellect.

A Catholic ruction was raging,
The Methodists kneeling to pray;
Then they pulled down the tent like Arabs
And swore that he should not stay.

Gems of Thought.

BLESSED be the memory of the man who honestly and faithfully performs what he agrees.—D. M. Bennett.

FOR many weeks, when the snow was on the ground, Mrs. Carlyle could not stir beyond the garden, or even beyond her door. She had no great thoughts, as Carlyle had, to occupy her with the administration of the universe. He had deranged the faith in which she had been brought up, but he had not inoculated her with his own: and a dull gloom, sinking at last almost to apathy, fell upon her spirits. She fought against it, like a brave woman as she was. Carlyle's own views of the prospects of men in this world were not brilliant.—Froude's Life of Carlyle.

WAS Emerson's perception of the absurdity of any supernatural claim for Christianity as much an affair of reasoning with him as an affair of humor? He saw the incongruity of this toy-house theory with the general make of things. I hav often wondered how any man with a particle of humor in him could look up at the stars and still believe the doctrins of the Christian supernaturalism. Isolate any object, said Emerson, a turnip or an umbrella, from the connection of things, and it becomes at once ridiculous. It is as true of a religion as of a turnip; as true of Jesus as of an umbrella. "The soul knows no persons." The deification of Jesus is the grand historic testimony to the manner of man's thoughts toward God.—John W. Chadwick.

A FRIEND called on Michael Angelo, who was finishing a statue; some time after he called again; the sculptor was still at his work. His friend, looking at the figure, exclaimed, "You hav been idle since I saw you last!" "By no means," replied the sculptor, "I hav retouched this part and polished that; I hav softened this feature and brought out this muscle; I hav given more expression to this lip and more energy to this limb." "Well, well," said his friend, "but all these are trifles." "It may be so," replied Angelo, "but recollect that trifles make perfection, and that perfection is no trifle."—Colton's Lacon.

THE Jewish prophet was an extraordinary being. He was something more and something less than a man. He spoke like an angel; he acted like a beast. As soon as he received his mission he ceased to work. He often retired to the mountains where he might be seen skipping from rock to rock like a goat; or he wandered in the desert with a leather girdle round his loins, eating roots and wild honey; sometimes browsing on grass and flowers. He always adapted his actions to the idea he wished to convey. He not only taught in parables, but performed them. For instance, Isaiah walked naked through the streets [there seems to hav been no Comstocks or Judge Benedicts in those primitiv times to instruct the people what was obscene] to show that the Lord would trip Jerusalem and make her bare. Ezekiel cut off his hair and beard and weighed it in the scales; a third part he burnt with fire; a third part he strewed about with a knife; and a third part he scattered to the wind. This was also intended to illustrate the calamities which would befall the Jews. Moreover, he wore a rotten girdle as a sign that their city would decay, and buttered his bread—in a manner we would rather not describe—as a sign that they would eat defiled bread among the gentiles. Jeremiah wore a wooden yoke [and there was nothing indecent in this] as a sign that they would be taken into captivity. As a sign that the Jews were guilty of wantonness in worshiping idols, Hosea cohabited three years with a—woman of the town; and, lastly, as a sign that they committed adultery in turning from the Lord their God, he went and lived with another man's wife.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

IT is not what the future givs to us, but what we giv to the future, that constitutes the glory of our work.—Samuel P. Putnam.

LITERATURE is the greatest of all sources of refined pleasure, and one of the grandest uses of a liberal education is to enable us to enjoy that pleasure. There is scope enough for the purposes of liberal education in the study of the rich treasures of our own language alone. All that is needed is direction and the cultivation of a refined taste by attention to sound criticism. But there is no reason why French and German should not be mastered sufficiently to read what is worth reading in those languages with pleasure and with profit.—Huxley's Lay Sermons.

THE idea once conceived and verified that great and noble ends are to be achieved, by which the condition of the whole human species shall be permanently bettered, by bringing into exercise a sufficient quantity of sober thought, and by a proper adaptation of means, is of itself sufficient to set us earnestly on reflecting what ends are truly great and noble, either in themselvs or as conduciv to others of a still loftier character; because we are not now, as heretofore, hopeless of attaining them. It is not now equally harmless and insignificant whether we are right or wrong, since we are no longer supinely carried down the stream of events, but feel ourselvs capable of buffeting, at least, with its waves and perhaps of riding triumphantly over them; for why should we despair that the reason which has enabled us to subdue all nature to our purposes should (if permitted and assisted by the providence of God) achieve a far more difficult conquest; and ultimately find some means of enabling the collectiv wisdom of mankind to bear down those obstacles which individual short-sightedness, selfishness, and passion oppose to all improvements, and by which the highest hopes are continually blighted, and the fairest prospects marred.—Sir John Herschel.

IT is an insufferable pride for any man to pretend or conceit himself to differ so much from his brethren that he may be allowed to liv in sloth and ease, while the rest of mankind are subject to continual toil and trouble.—Dr. Isaac Barrow.

THE SNAKES IN THE RELIGIOUS BOOTS.

Notes and Clippings.

SOME resolutions passed upon the death of a downeast Knight of Labor incidentally refer to the deity as G. M. W. of the universe.

A NEW YORK clergyman, in a recent sermon, exhorted his congregation to "vote as you pray," and later on he advised them to "pray often."

THE Methodists charge that the scheme for Christian unity just now causing so much discussion is an attempt of the Episcopalians "to absorb the rest of Christendom."

THE South Carolina synod, in session at Cheraw, has requested Professor Woodrow, who is accused of teaching the doctrin of evolution, to resign his chair in the theological seminary.

THE latest and perhaps the most appropriate use of the chestnut bell was made by Dr. Bellamy, a prominent physician of Milledgeville, Ga., who carried his little gong to church and rung it when the minister struck into the Lord's prayer.

THE state synod of the Presbyterian church, in session at Pittsburgh, Pa., hav passed a resolution condemning the "Andover" doctrin of a second probation. It may therefore be considered as settled that heathen and unbelievers who are dead are damned.

RECENTLY a New York girl of 15, who had taken lessons in "First Aid to the Injured," was in Fallsburgh, N. Y., when a boy was thrown from a wagon and his leg broken. She at once put her knowledge into use, set the leg, and he is recovering fast. Supposing this girl had been to none but a Sunday-school and had gone down upon her knees and prayed?

IMMEDIATELY after delivering his sermon on Sunday, the 17th inst., the Rev. Dr. Rodman H. Robinson, rector of the M. E. church at Fort Plain, N. Y., had a stroke of paralysis and died Wednesday evening following. It is not supposed to be a case of swift retribution.

SEVERAL Catholic priests hav been speaking at Henry George meetings, and urging his election as mayor. At the same time they deny that they hav indorsed him. It is suspected that they wish to so hedge that they can claim him if elected, and repudiate him if defeated.

A YOUNG hippopotamus worth $2,000 was imported last week and placed on exhibition in Central Park. The duty on the animal was $400. Home manufactures must be protected, or the hippopotamus-makers of of this country will be reduced to the starvation wages of Europe!

FATHER KAVANAGH, a prominent Catholic priest at Kildare, Ireland, was recently killed by the fall of the statue of a saint. He was conducting services at the time. These statues in Catholic churches being practically graven images, this is an appropriate place to repeat the remark that Satan still some mischief finds for idol hands to do.

OUR friends of the American Board of Foreign Missions hav settled about the status of the heathen's ancestors. They hav gone to torment. The board is sorry, no doubt, but facts are facts, and it is mistaken kindness to try to change them. Let the heathen comfort themselvs. Their forefathers will hav plenty of good company.—Life.

SOMEBODY played a great joke on the Universalist general convention at Akron, O. Printed cards were sent to about three hundred of the delegates, inviting them to take a 5 o'clock dinner at the house of Dr. Cone, president of the Buchtel College. At the appointed hour the divines appeared in force, much to the dismay of the doctor and his wife. An investigation was started by the president to discover the perpetrator.

THE editor of the Winsted Press thus expresses himself on the Prohibition question: "'If a man has a right to drink what he pleases he has a right to drink as much as he pleases, that is, to get drunk.' So says the Prohibition organ, the Voice. Is it then a question if a man has a right to drink what he pleases? We think not. We will drink what we please. We will even drink that which we detest if it be necessary to maintain our right to drink what we please. Who are these little self-appointed gods who assume the right to dictate to us what we shall drink and what we shall not drink?"

THE Weekly Argus, published at Petaluma, Cal., contains this item of news: "Philip Cowen, one of our old and reliable business men, a cool-headed thinker and a good writer on political economy, has been nominated by the labor unions for Congress from the first district. In this instance the old saying that 'a prophet is not without honor save in his own country,' does not hold good, for Mr. Cowen is honored for his spotless character and upright career among us for a quarter of a century." Besides being a Labor Reformer, Mr. Cowen is a Freethinker, and has his mind invigorated from week to week by a perusal of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

"WHAT queer notions children do get into their heads," said a surburbanite. "This morning my little five-year-old girl attended Sunday-school for the first time, and she came home full of the idea that she must take some pennies with her next Sunday. 'No more pennies for candy, papa,' she exclaimed; 'they must all be saved for the Sunday-school.' 'And what do they do with the pennies at Sunday-school?' 'Oh, they send them up to God.' 'And what does God do with them?' 'Oh,' she said, after a moment's hesitation, 'he throws them down again to see the little children scramble for them. That's the way he has fun.'"—Chicago Herald.

ELISHA GEDNEY, a wealthy farmer and an enthusiastic Second Adventist, at Middlebury, Conn., according to a correspondent of the New York Herald, is setting the town agog by the erection of a wooden god for worship. The image has been carefully carved, is about four feet high, and built after the general plan of a mummy. The neighbors noticed him at work for some months on the strange looking figure, and supposed he must be building a scarecrow which was to last for ages. The old man is sane on every other subject, and says he first conceived the idea of this graven image while reading the account of Daniel in the lion's den. He insists that the image is Daniel. The world, he says, will end with the first indication of the image's decay, which will begin at the toes. Gedney believes strongly in faith cures and in the near approach of the world's end.

Communications.

The Church and its Influence.

The dupes of a revealed religion can never progress; they are always fettered by the ignorance of the past, and proud of the chains which bind them. They innocently oppose every improvement because their faith is founded in an old book which they believe emanated from God, and contains everything necessary to our salvation, and they believe that the scheme of salvation should most occupy the minds of men. The tendency of such belief is to prevent men from rising above the plane of civilization in which their book originated.

Think of a pious old butcher building and manning a vessel, and putting out to sea with the purpose of plundering and sinking every vessel which he might fall in with, and this pious old shark having prayer and religious services on his vessel every day!

For money church dignitaries hav granted licenses to waylay and rob anywhere within certain described limits.

And to this day Christianity has not materially improved. Many men who occupy a high position in the church are at the same time members of some of the most soulless corporations and monopolies. Some of the great land-stealers and robbing railroad kings are shining lights in the church to-day.

Even the James brothers, the great bank robbers and train wreckers, and Guiteau, and nearly every pious crank who gets "jerked to Jesus," are as full of prayer and Christianity as a stuffed turkey.

Christianity has opposed every step in science, and not even to her credit can it be said that she has been the promoter of good morals. Draper says, "There was hardly a philosopher who was not punished; some were put to death." With all the light of the nineteenth century, the church has not outgrown this bigotry. In some states and countries a man is not allowed to testify in court if he entertain peculiar notions about God, or so-called sacred writings; and generally, if a man speak against even the monstrosities of the Bible, he is considered a bad man.

All through the early days of Christianity this spirit of religious bigotry and persecution was carried to such an extent that some of the most valuable writings and some of the finest libraries were destroyed. In some cases the death penalty was inflicted for not destroying certain heretical writings wherever found.

The Inquisition was originated for the express purpose of suppressing the freedom of thought. In 1481, the first year of the Inquisition, two thousand victims were burnt in Andalusia. Seventeen thousand were fined or imprisoned for life. Torquemada, the inquisitor, pursued his victims with the ferocity of a tiger. In eighteen years ten thousand were burnt at the stake, and over ninety-seven thousand were otherwise punished. Torture was inflicted in vaults where no friend could hear their cries.

The families of the accused were disgraced and plunged into helpless ruin. Untold treasure flowed into the church from the rich for dispensations to keep them from the Inquisition. No thought, written or oral, against the church was allowed to go unpunished. Six thousand volumes of Oriental literature were destroyed by fire through the instigation of the church. If some of those volumes had been allowed to come down to us they would hav put an entirely different phase on the early history of the church.

On March 30, 1492, an edict was issued for expelling every unbaptized Jew from Spain by the last of the following July. They were to suffer death if they remained. They were to take no gold or silver away with them. All property which they could not carry away must be left behind. The clergy did all that lay in their power to render these poor outraged mortals objects of hatred to the Spanish people.

When the time came the roads were choked with these poor sufferers, and the air was filled with the wailings of despair. Corpses of wrinkled old women and nursing mothers and babes, who had died of hunger and thirst, were found by the wayside.

In February, 1502, a dispensation was issued to drive out all unbaptized Moors by the end of the following April. They, like the Jews, were allowed to take away with them neither gold or silver, which amounted to a confiscation of their property. It was claimed by these Spanish Christians to be an act of mercy to banish them, as they held the right to take the life of every Moor for his unblushing Infidelity.

Such hav been the means which the church has adopted to settle the differences between Christians and their opposers. Humanity must ever weep when it contemplates this picture. Every pretense to freedom is a sham as long as the mind is enslaved. Every Christian who attempts to shield his religion by dwarfing the human intellect may deserve well at the hands of the church, but the fewer of them we hav in a republic the better.

Just in proportion as a man is a good Christian he will prove a bad republican. To be a good Christian is to believe the Bible—not, as Talmage says, "in spots," but to believe that every chapter is the inspired word of God. This leads the devotee to oppose everything contrary to scripture. He will be no wiser than his father, and his children no wiser than he. One generation will succeed another without improvement. It was such belief which sunk all Europe in darkness, as though a millstone had been tied around her neck, for more than a thousand years.

The true spirit of republicanism cannot be bound to creeds or forms; it is born of progress and of freedom; it knows nothing about an embargo on the mind.

But the narrow-minded Christian will insist that the "divine word of God" is above all earthly knowledge, and that all men should rule and be ruled in the fear of God. His theory would put all the offices into the hands of ecclesiastics or their dupes. The Bible would be put into the common schools, become the only book of any importance; Christ would be recognized as the supreme ruler, and in a few generations the people would be "determined to know nothing but Christ him crucified," and the scenes of the dark ages would be reënacted.

The idea of the divinity of Christ has been dinned in the ear of the Christian until he believes that there are none but Jews and a few Infidels who doubt it. Christ was known simply as a reformer. Nobody considered him a miraculous character in his day. The idea of his being an emanation from divine power was all seasoned and served years after his death, and has been disputed and bitterly opposed up to the present day.

In the controversy between Nestorius and Cyril, Nestorius, after descanting on the attributes of the eternal God, exclaims, "And can it be possible that this God can hav a mother?"

When the sepulcher of Christ was burnt, and the churches were rifled and burnt, and priceless relics were scattered to the four winds; when the cross of Christ was carried away with derisiv shouts of laughter; when Bethlehem, Gethsemane, and Calvary, the most sacred places known to Christianity, were insulted, profaned, and desecrated by a hostil soldiery—"If Christ is God, why don't he send a flaming sword—why don't he open the earth and swallow his enemies?" exclaimed the Persian soldiers. Not a single miracle followed this awful desecration. Christians stood amazed, but amazement subsided, and disbelief in the divinity of Christ followed to many.

There was a man who retired a few miles from Mecca, and gave himself up to meditation and prayer. As a result of his meditation, he announced to the world that "nobody could believe in the sonship of Jesus as begotten by the almighty, in the character of Mary, as at once a virgin, a mother, and the queen of heaven, without incurring the peril of blasphemy."

Unto the day of his death he wore a seal ring upon which was engraved, "Mohammed, the Messenger of God." His central doctrin was, "There is but one God." The doctrin proclaimed by this great man is the religious guide of nearly one-third of the human race. Those of the Moslem faith hav always called Christians idolaters, and regarded them with loathing.

"I will cleave the skull of any blaspheming idolater who says that the most holy God, the almighty and eternal, has begotten a son," was the motto of the early Moslem soldier. "Praise be to God, the Lord of this and the other world, who has neither female consort or son." Such is the sentiment of nearly one-third of the world's people to-day. And it may be said that from the birth of Christ down to the present time there has not a century passed but some of the ablest men of their time hav stood up and denied the divinity of Christ.

Though there has been a great effort on the part of Christians to hide these facts, the facts remain. Those who hav studied Christian tactics closely know full well that it has been the practice of Christians to try to hide what they could not depreciate, and to try to depreciate what they could not hide. If the Christian could be made acquainted with all the facts of his religion, the trick and the trade of his priest would not be worth the learning.

Christianity hath done the world much harm. It has stopped its progress by teaching holy absurdities. It has taught that the great family of worlds to which we belong was made in six days out of nothing; that the earth was flat, and that there was a universal flood, and all the human beings and animals that survived were saved in a big boat; that the first man and woman were created pure and perfect, and that they ate an apple which did not agree with them, and a mysterious taint from that apple affected every member of the human family for all coming time, and much more of the same kind of holy froth. For thousands of years men hav been taught that anything which contradicts these silly Bible statements is a lie and of the devil.

The church, like a giant with a club, has ever stood ready to fell to the earth all who hav shown the courage to attempt to lead the people out of this wilderness of superstition and falsehood. And she has shown a willingness to put down truth and science with death-dealing blows when they came in contact with her interests. The struggle has been a long and bitter one, and the church has maintained her position as long as falsehood and persecution were available.

Draper says: "When Christianity had obtained imperial power, the dictates of her councils became compulsory, being enforced by the civil power."

With all her high pretensions to piety and charity, clothe the church with civil power and all argument will cease. "Believe or be damned" would be thundered from every pulpit, and every priest and minister would become an executioner of the law; and every unbeliever would find a hell of torture here and then be consigned to the plutonian regions hereafter. The fact that force and undue means hav been employed to propagate the Christian religion should be taken as evidence that it is not the true religion. True religion will be accepted on account of its reasonableness. There will be no indulgences sold, and few, if any, required. The sale of indulgences, and force and fraud, hav been characteristic features of the Christian religion for centuries.

It was the sale of indulgences which helped to forward the Reformation. Luther builded better than he knew. He stood for the right of private judgment and against the power of the church and the pope. He assumed the right to put his own interpretation upon the scriptures, and then invoked the curses of heaven and the torments of hell upon all who dared to differ from him.

He did not see that the right of private judgment belonged to others if it belonged to him. He did not see that every other man had the same right to differ from him that he had to differ from the pope and the church. It seems anomalous to call men reformers who put their religious creed above reason and science, and inflicted the death penalty for differences of opinion. The Christian religion, because inconsistent, has employed very inconsistent means for its promulgation.

The "Puritan Fathers" left home, and country, and friends for the purpose of worshiping God according to the dictates of conscience. But they gave those not a little trouble who differed from them, and all the while they were guilty of differing from somebody else.

Christians are naturally proscriptiv—their religion makes them so. There is no absurdity too great for them to swallow provided it is written down in an old book, which to them is nothing less than an idol. This idol has the strange power of tying back the Christian to the ignorance of primitiv ages, when it was believed that the gods held converse with men.

Though the death and burial of an author is recorded in a book, in what purports to be his own hand, it does not increase the difficulty of the Christian. In his ("spiritual") eye it is all as clear as mud ("spiritual" mud of course).

Giv the Christian the power, and he would hang a man as quick for doubting the possibility of a man writing an account of his own death and burial as he would for saying anything else detrimental to the interests of the church. Christianity is something which is to be taken without reason, taken often and swallowed whole.

The first five books of the Old Testament are attributed to Moses. But inasmuch as they contain an account of his death and burial (Deut. xxxiv, 5, 6) it is evident that he did not write them, and, of course, they are without authority. But if the name of the author were positivly known, according to Draper, it would not help the matter very much, for he says: "No one dare attribute them (the five books of Moses) to the inspiration of almighty God, their inconsistencies, incongruities, contradictions, and impossibilities are so great."

Nothing can be more ridiculous than the idea of a snake, gifted with the power of speech, gliding through the garden fence and persuading Mrs. Adam to eat an apple so peculiar in its nature as to giv her a sort of moral colic, and all the generations which followed her, and which nothing but the blood of a carpenter could assuage.

Oh, how it gravels the kidneys of a Christian to be compelled to giv up the fall of man! Because he knows that when that most ridiculous of all holy humbugs is abandoned, the atonement goes up like a puff of smoke.

It is humiliating to witness how the church has been compelled by the onward march of civilization to abandon one false position after another with all her high claims to heavenly guidance. And yet she has never had the honesty to admit her error.

A flat earth, the right to burn heretics, the Mosaic account of creation, and many other absurdities, hav been abandoned by the church, and yet all hav been believed to be in accord with the "old book."

It seems to be a fact that all men are not permitted to see a great truth at the same time. One man often sees a truth many years in advance of all the rest. And it has been the practice of the church to kill the man if it could not hide the new truth. For more than a thousand years all Europe was dominated with this Christian spirit.

The proud empires of Mexico and Peru melted like snow before this dominant spirit of the church, and all that remained of these once populous and fertil countries were blood, bleaching bones, ashes, and slavery. But they were found heathen, they were left Christian, and, perhaps, the Christian God was pleased with the change.

Such scenes can never be reënacted. Not because the will of the church is not good enough, but because the newspaper and the magazine hav become more potent than the pulpit. The school-teacher has outgrown the preacher, the school-house has overshadowed the church; in short, a free press has dulled the edge of the ecclesiastical sword. Perhaps it would not be entirely fair to say that the press is free from church influence. But it no longer asks the church what books it may print, or what papers it may publish, and, like a faithful watch-dog, it shows its teeth when the church attempts to use undue power.

Liberal papers, in spite of the church, and the ravings of "Mad Anthony," are published, in which church matters are freely discussed. Liberal lecturers of splendid talent are bearing aloft the torch of reason, and proclaiming to the world that men are of more consequence than the gods, that science is of more consequence than Christianity, and are fast bringing the world to see that instead of rendering ourselvs miserable here in order to be happy hereafter, we ought to enjoy every comfort which this life, rationally, can be made to yield.

Socialism in India.

III.

India never encouraged import or export trade. It was considered sinful to raise more than necessary crops. The Hindoos never harassed foreign markets with their goods and coveted their neighbors' wealth, hence they never became immensely rich. In Europe and America commercial activity is manifested all along the sea-coast, where large towns and cities hav been built, as the fruit and result of aggrandizement of those countries which deserted their ports and confined themselvs to internal commerce; hence we hav no cities established on the sea-coast. All the products and industries were consumed in the country. Our mechanics dealt with consumers direct, so that the actual price of their goods went into their pockets. In India a shoemaker sells his articles direct to those who want to wear them, and therefore gets the full price of them. Cooperativ system is beneficial to the capitalist and detrimental to laborers. In my country laborers are independent. No wages will induce them to work more than eight hours. Skilled labor cannot be had for any price except through coaxing. Laborers are paid very small wages, but it goes to support a family of four members, whereas an American laborer, who boasts of his high wages, has hardly enough for himself. Besides, the American labor market is so full that politicians and legislators are on the alert as to what means should be devised to frustrate and foil the honest earnings of other nations. Many emigrants lately came here from Hungary, Norway, Sweden, and Italy, and returned home disappointed. But in India we adopted a different policy. Instead of seeking emigration from Africa, China, and other colonies, and then murdering them wholesale, the Hindoos restricted emigration to foreign lands. They allowed no one to cross the ocean, and in default excommunicated and debarred him from society. They knew that it was wise to prevent their own people from intruding upon other lands. They preached the doctrin of contentment. I hav sufficiently explained how laborers hav stood before capitalists, and how the injustice done by one was counterbalanced by imposition of religious duties upon another in India. It remains to be explained, however, how the kings stood toward two lower and one higher classes. They lived on homage voluntarily paid by the subjects. Their relation was that of a father toward his children. There was no tax on land; it was on products only. No crop, no tax. If the kings became turbulent and tyrannical, they were immediately accused by the Brahmans, who are their spiritual guides. On their ban being pronounced, the king had no alternativ but to abdicate his throne, otherwise no one will pay him any homage or respect. Religiously speaking, the destiny of tyrants and oppressors was hell, other classes having the option or chance of improvement; but the kings must go to one or the other place, according to their ill or well doing. They therefore seldom misbehaved, and if they did, they were at once forced into retirement on handing over the kingdom to worthy successors.

Nowhere except in India hav the kings willingly transferred their concerns to others, and sought solitudes as the best places of repose. Under such beneficent rulers, why would there be bad kings and discontented subjects? On the contrary, the happiness of mankind was the paramount duty of rulers. The kings always sent emissaries with a view to ascertain the causes of discontent among the people, and immediately redressed them if noticed. Such was the power and influence of spiritual nobility that their word was a gospel truth to all classes. They were the regulators of society, justices of the peace, and preservers of order. They were the professors of arts and sciences. And yet they were not the participators of material prosperity or worldly pleasures. They renounced themselvs, and thus became the admiration of all. If they loved the world, they at once fell down from the hight of their high position, and became one of the three lower classes. In India he is the highest who has not even a particle of metal; his food consists of fruits and roots, his garments are made of the barks of trees, his ornaments are dried fruits and shells, his cups and saucers are of wood, his soap is mud, his powder is ashes that keep him from cold and heat, his shoes are wooden sandals—in short, his treasure is spiritual knowledge. Compare side by side your first class and our first class, one rolling in luxury and another in penury, one in palaces and another in huts. The Brahmans of India hav never owned extensiv landed property or enormous wealth. The chiefs and merchants are moneyed men, but the priests hav always been the poorest; hence we giv them the highest place in our estimation. India does not need Anarchy, nor are our laborers against the capitalists. Pause and think. India is thickly populated, and yet there has been no instance on record during thousands of years of any social disturbance marring the tranquility of my country. Our highest men are born of the poorest parents.

I will conclude by telling you something about our social life, so that you may understand the difference between ours and yours, and decide for yourselvs which is the best. We do not marry for pleasure. We marry for children. Man and woman without a son are pitiable and unfortunate members of society. They therefore marry with that avowed object.

All stages of progress from womanhood to motherhood are heralded to four quarters, so to say, and each development publicly celebrated, so that every month, nay, even every day, is counted both by the members of the family and by their neighbors, so as to know exactly the period of completion. Every thing is sacred, and noble, and auspicious. Our children are therefore born in innocence and virtue, and not in sin, as is said to hav been the case in other countries. Such men only are eligible for marriage who hav parents, brothers, and sisters to liv with. The object in seeking such grooms is that in case of bereavement or widowhood the married woman may hav somebody to support her, and her children, if any. We therefore hav no orphanages, and homes for widows. The marriage life is recommended to all citizens as the best of all states, because a married person is more useful to society than a single one. It is one of the duties of our religious married life that the host should inquire after any guests or strangers in the village needing hospitality and shelter, and if any, bring him home and entertain him kindly. Love begets love; kindness begets kindness. If I be kind to one, he will be kind to another. This custom of entertaining strangers in all houses has done away with county-houses maintained at tremendous cost, but no feelings, in other countries and kept under obligation human souls who otherwise would hav become felons and peace-breakers. The Hindoo religion enjoins for all classes compulsory retirement from activ life at a certain age, so that they may relinquish their claims on property for the good of succeeding generations. The Hindoos do not make wills. Property, both movable and immovable, is equally divided among all sons, the father having the right to giv with his own hands as much wealth as he pleases, but nothing by will. Widows are entitled to maintenance in the absence of any nearest relativs, such as sons, from distant relativs, husbands, brothers, fathers, and uncles. Even the spiritual nobility, who rule the affairs of the country, are forced into further retirements, that they may not grow vainglorious over their just and good management of state, for no man is said to be perfect before he ceases to float on the influence of his ego or personality. One person earns and supports ten to twenty relativs; the eldest brother having the care of all the youngest. He supports them, and their wives, and children. It is a disgrace in India for one man in business to see his brothers and sisters aunts and uncles, begging their bread. We hav therefore an undivided family system, which binds sometimes fifty members into one household. It is a delightful thing to look at when so many are gathered and sheltered under one roof.

So much has been said and written purposely to misrepresent my country and my institutions that I should like to put in a word or two "on castes in India." There is a common belief in this country that the high caste in India always trampled under foot the low caste; even the shadows of such unfortunates are said to hav been avoided by the Brahmans. Nothing is more erroneous and misleading than this misstatement. Our customs and rules are misunderstood. The history of India, at least, contradicts such statements. Among the four classes enumerated above, there is not one I know of whose shadow is contaminating to the higher ones. India, however, is not entirely rid of those miscreants whom other nations treat as felons, and confine for life within four walls. Why do you do so? "Oh, that is a bad element, unsafe to be allowed to sojourn in our neighborhood," is the reply given by every well-meaning person. The Hindoos, instead of imprisoning such elements, accord them different, but humane, treatment. They classify the criminals and immoral people as outcasts, and assign to them such duties as they richly merit. We do not deprive them of their independence by confinement, but we employ them for outdoor work, such as dragging the carcasses of dead animals, removing night-soil, and keeping a watch at night. This humane treatment makes them better citizens than the criminals in other countries turn out to be. The criminals in India, though ou casts for reasons best known to themselvs, are a superior or a better behaved community than most of the speculators and bankers I hav met with in other countries. What difference is there between our outcasts and your criminals? You keep them out of sight by compulsory imprisonment, as if they were ferocious animals, while we keep ourselvs out of their shadows, for which they are not sorry. Our criminals never become turbulent and revengeful. They do not kill the prosecutor or the judge, but always beg to be excused for their shadows being inadvertently cast upon the Brahmans, whom they regard as their benefactors and liberators. The Hindoos never tried criminals on the evidence of witnesses. Our criminals are honest enough to confess their guilt, as the house set on fire blazes in all directions. We punish them socially by proscribing their association with us, hence they liv outside the towns and cities as persons infected by contagious diseases.

We do not locate our bad boys and girls in houses of correction and refuge. Parents drive them out of their houses for misdemeanor, and only readmit them on some neighbor standing guarantee for their future good behavior. When the children are driven away, which is very rare, neighbors take them into the houses and mold them into repentance so that they may stand guarantee before their parents. But if we had sent them to jails, they would hav been spoiled for life. I may, without contradiction, boldly assert that all the lawless people in other countries were either the inmates of orphan asylums, or houses of refuge and correction.

In the name of God, if you hav any, I ask you. O deep thinkers and philosophers, ladies and gentlemen, to pause and think how that country of mine, teeming with life, has lived century after century without strikes or disturbance, penury or starvation. Liv as we do. Do away with your prisons and penitentiaries, asylums and pauper houses. No man intentionally commits crimes, and, therefore, deserves no imprisonment. We all are faulty and criminals One is detected, and the rest escape being caught, but that should not giv us any prestige over the unfortunate one. Let our motto be, Charity for all and humanity to ourselvs. I do not blame any nation. We are what we hav sown. Let us therefore be better and accept truth from any quarter. India is the land which leads to salvation. India never planted corruption, and never had evil fruits: India always imported good things, or spread good influence over other nations, retaining her vices for her children. O India! long may liv thy name. All nations will ultimately take refuge in thee.

Dear friends, I hav detained you long, but don't go away without realizing the great, grand truth that we are slaves to prejudices. I am not an exception. Let me therefore feel proud of my country as I gladly let you be of your own. We all are pedlers exchanging goods of commodity. Your goods are precious and costly, and mine are trifling and worthless. Let me, therefore, carry your valuable things to my people, and leave mine instead.

GOPAL VINAYAK JOSHEE.

A Suggestion Carried Out.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your last issue I observed, among the "Notes and Clippings," the following paragraph:

> When General Corse, the recently appointed postmaster at Boston, was beleaguered in the city of Altoona, General Sherman signaled to him, "Hold the fort, I am coming." From this dispatch comes the "Hold the Fort" hymn. But somehow or other General Corse's reply seems to hav been omitted from the sacred verse. What he signaled back was this: "I am minus an ear and part of a jaw, but we can lick all hell yet." The omission is probably a clerical error, and the hymn should be at once revised.

The question is worth considering, and in the interest of historical accuracy I would offer this as a starter:

> Hold the fort, for I am coming
> (Jerk the chestnut bell);
> Wave the answer back to heaven,
> "We can lick all hell."

This version, I maintain, modernizes the hymn, and givs it a force and completeness which it lacked before, and, as far as I can judge, preserves its sacred character intact.

Call for the Tenth Annual Congress.

To the Auxiliary Secular Unions and to all Citizens of the United States and Canadas who support the Nine Demands of Liberalism:

You are invited to attend the Tenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, to be held in New York city, at Chickering Hall, Fifth avenue and 18th street, on November 11th, 12th, and 13th, and also on Sunday evening, the 14th, a lecture by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, which concludes the Congress.

Pursuant to a vote of the last Congress, notice is hereby given that the following amendments to the constitution of the Union will be acted upon: 1. To reduce the fee for life-membership from $25 to $10. 2. Or, on payment of $10 by applicant for membership, to authorize the secretary to issue ten-year membership certificates, with all the privileges of life-membership during that time. 3. Whenever a man or woman has taken out annual membership certificates for three or five consecutiv years, such person thereafter on payment of annual-membership fee to possess the privilege of life-membership.

The Congress will also be called upon to consider measures for carrying on the work of Freethought, and securing the adoption of such laws by the various state governments and by the national government, as shall make the United States thoroughly Secular, and the repeal of all laws now on the statute-books which conflict with the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

Local auxiliary Unions are entitled by the Union constitution to five representativs in the Congress—the president and secretary and three delegates. All charter-members and life-members, all vice-presidents, all chairmen of state executiv committees, are entitled to seats and votes in the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats but not votes, except by permission of the Congress.

It is hoped that every auxiliary Union will send a full delegation to the Congress, and that every Freethinker in the United States and Canada, who can, will be present.

Per order of board of directors:

R. G. INGERSOLL, President.
SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Secretary.
COURTLANDT PALMER, Treasurer.

News and Notes.

OUR GALAXY OF SPEAKERS.

The purpose of the New York Congress in November is not simply to transact business which is of great importance, but also to create a vast public interest, and to put forth a declaration of our ideas and principles, upon the platform, which will not only giv an impulse to Liberals, but spread abroad a knowledge of the Freethought movement among the masses of the people. To this end representativ and able speakers hav been selected to address the Congress on various living topics. We could not make use of all the wealth of material that is in our ranks. The time and funds do not permit. The choice must be limited. I think, however, the Liberal public will recognize in the list presented, able and eloquent advocates of our cause. In this regard the Congress will be an occasion of rare interest and delight.

L. K. Washburn, of New England, is just becoming universally known. His discourses are widely read, and they show the radical mind and cultivated spirit. There is grace combined with strength, a profound understanding of the age, and clear voicing of its hope. His subject at the Congress will be "The Popular Faith Criticised."

Charles Watts who comes from England to make America his home, whose energetic disposition seeks the "broad and universal theater" which the New World presents, will be with us. His platform oratory is well known. He will lecture upon "Theological Misconceptions."

J. H. Burnham, of Michigan, scholarly and thoughtful, in whom the Methodist fire still burns, and reason's torch alone illumins, will giv his exceedingly interesting discourse, "The Philosophy of the Religious Emotions." This is pronounced one of his best efforts.

E. A. Stevens, of Chicago, one of our earnest workers, as well as clearest thinkers, who stands for the right whether popular or unpopular, will speak on "Science and Atheism." This address is a fine exposition of modern thought.

John E. Remsburg, our "Lightning Express" lecturer, who seems to be in several places at the same time, and keeps orthodoxy in a constant panic, will speak upon "The Fathers of the Republic." If any one understands the mind of these master spirits, Mr. Remsburg does. Now that Liberty is about to enlighten the world from its lofty pedestal in New York harbor where crowd such revolutionary associations, it is well that they who put forth the grandest political document in the world's history, the Declaration of Independence, which is the "Genesis" of the New Bible of Humanity, should be understood in their essential character. They were Freethinkers as well as heroes and reformers. No man is more capable for this historic work than Mr. Remsburg.

T. B. Wakeman, who is always solid as well as entertaining, will deliver the gospel of Liberty, Science, and Humanity.

Mrs. F. C. Reynolds is a new star in our galaxy, but she is welcomed by all as a bright and shining light. As secretary of the New York Freethinkers' Association she is putting new life into the Liberalism of the Empire state. She will speak her mind on "Woman: Past, Present, and Future."

C. B. Reynolds, who is fresh from the fires of martyrdom and the glories of New Jersey justice, "regenerated," no doubt, by this experience, will giv us a most vigorous campaign speech. Come and welcome this brave soldier who now bears the brunt of the battle.

Helen H. Gardener, who has won a national reputation by her book "Men, Women, and Gods," will continue her brilliant criticisms of Christianity in her new lecture, "The Pulpit, Pew, and Cradle." The title is enough to show that we shall hav something entertaining and instructiv.

And brightest amid this glowing picture is our president, Robert G. Ingersoll. To hear him is to understand more of American life and thought and progress than by any book or other discourse. Ingersoll is one of those men who make history, for his speech is action—a part of the "logic of events."

Others we hope will be with us, and those who cannot come send good wishes for the Congress.

Elizabeth Cady Stanton writes: "I am proposing to sail for Europe on the 27th. If anything should occur to prevent me, I shall be very happy to fulfil my engagement to stand on your platform, where I hav been in spirit for so many years."

Mrs. Mattie Krekel, of Kansas City, writes: "It will not be possible for me to be in attendance at Congress of Liberals this year. I hope that it will be a glorious success, and am sure that it will be fruitful of good." It will be a disappointment, indeed, to the many friends of Mrs. Krekel that she cannot attend the Congress, but her good wishes shall help make it the triumph that we all desire.

Courtlandt Palmer, whose enthusiasm and generosity hav always been a support to our cause remains in Europe for the invigoration of his health and strength, but we look forward to his return and restoration to that noble work which has endeared his name to American Liberals. In the midst of our brilliant gathering we shall remember those in distant lands, whose heart and hope are with us.

I hope to see at least a thousand Liberals from all parts of the country, from Maine to California, present to welcome the New York legion. This metropolis has been called the "eye of America." We certainly shall take a long look ahead amid the flash of its imperial glories. The torch of Liberty, four hundred feet in air, will fling its radiant light upon our path. Is it not an auspicious moment for mental exaltation?

HEMPSTEAD, N. Y.

I lectured on Sunday before the new and growing association of Freethinkers at Hempstead, N. Y. Under the able management of its president, Mr. C. F. De Mott, this society is becoming a fine intellectual and social influence in this beautiful Long Island village. It has a library, reading-room, and gymnasium, so that mind and body both find cultivation. Mr. De Mott also, on Tuesday and Thursday evenings, teaches classes in stenography, and these classes are constantly increasing, and through them a great interest is aroused in the work of the association. This struggling and brave society is an excellent model for others to follow. It grows steadily on—slowly and surely building for science and humanity. I was delighted to meet this band of courageous Radicals.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Liberalism Developing in Tennessee.

The Chattanooga Sunday Times thinks it would startle the clergy of that city to become fully acquainted with the rapid development of Liberalism in that place. The Times reports the existence of a club of Infidels numbering about eighty "activ, vigorous, and energetic members." This membership consists largely of ladies and prominent business and professional men.

The Liberal Club.

New York was full of political oratory on Friday evening last. Henry George had Chickering Hall, and Abram Hewitt had Cooper-Union hall, and the reports next morning showed that the enthusiasm at both meetings was unparalleled. Sky-rockets made the night luminous, and there were music and all the other accessories to a political campaign by which statesmen are wont to fire the popular heart.

These things did not prevent a goodly audience from attending the 419th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club. There were a few vacant seats scattered about the room, which the Chair accounted for by saying that many regular attendants were at Chickering Hall, where Mr. George was making the greatest effort of his life. After the names of two new candidates for membership in the club had been read, the speaker of the evening, Mr. Samuel P. Putnam, was introduced as one who had studied many different kinds of religion and been born anew into most of them. His subject was "Mormonism."

Mr. Putnam was received with hearty applause. His trip West has not cost him the loss of any flesh, and as an orator he appears to hav been growing in grace. He addressed the chair with that respect due to its dignity, made his manners gracefully to the audience, and delivered what he had to say about the Mormons in a clear, distinct, and interesting manner. The Mormons, he said, had treated him well; some of their bishops had even introduced him to audiences whom he was to address on the subject of Freethought. Mormonism is founded on the Bible, and is more a biblical religion than either Catholicism or Protestantism. The Mormons' God is the God of Abram and Isaac and Jacob; their Christ is the same old myth the rest of Christendom worships. The Book of Mormon is not intended to supersede the Bible, but is a sort of supplement to it.

Polygamy had its source in the fundamental desire of the Mormons to increase their numbers and possess the earth. Furthermore, as every Mormon expects to be a god and reign over all his posterity in the next world, he is ambitious to hav that posterity as numerous as possible that his kingdom may be large. Polygamy, the speaker held to be a moral question, and therefore not to be dealt with by legal, but by moral methods. If polygamy were abandoned, the government would no longer hav a reason for not admitting Utah as a state; and once admitted as a state, the Mormons of Utah could make their own marriage laws, and could hav all the polygamy they wanted. In solving the Mormon problem, therefore, Mr. Putnam did not believe in suppressing polygamy by law, but he did believe in disfranchising every member of the Mormon church. They place the church above the government of the United States; they get their authority from "God" and are therefore subjects of an alien power. For this reason they are not American citizens and should not be permitted to vote on state affairs.

The lecture had a somewhat startling effect upon the audience, and the Chair announced that it was fully as remarkable as had been expected. The floor was open for speeches of ten minutes each.

Dr. Eccles spoke first. He objected to disfranchising the Mormons, because the same ruling would disfranchise the members of trades unions and other organizations.

Dr. Lambert spoke fifteen minutes on the subject of Prohibition.

Mr. Duffy, who is not a member of the club, occupied ten minutes. Everybody wished he had abbreviated his remarks, which were without sense or even decency.

Dr. Kinget held that the logic of Freethought would not permit us to disfranchise anybody on account of any organization to which he might belong.

Captain Clark held that the Chicago Anarchists should be hanged.

Mrs. Hallock, whose husband, Dr. Hallock, was one of the first members of the club, offered a few appropriate remarks. She had been twelve years in Europe, but came home more convinced than ever that America was the best country in the world to liv in. She spoke of the danger with which Roman Catholicism threatened this and every other civilized government. Catholics, much more than Mormons, were traitors to American institutions, and could much more justly be disfranchised.

In closing the debate Mr. Putnam urged that the central point of his argument had not been touched, namely, that the Mormons were subjects of an alien power. Others might make the application; he had merely stated the principle.

During the latter part of the exercises many who had been to the Henry George meeting came back to the club and filled nearly all the seats. The indicted blasphemer, Mr. Reynolds, was there, and acted the part of a patient listener. The weight of his arrest does not appear to hav fallen heavily upon him. He persists in wearing his high hat tilted slightly to one side, and preserves the same debonnair bearing that has carried him through his various adversities up to the present time.

At the next meeting Mr. James Redpath will endeavor to make it appear that all good citizens should vote for Henry George. But before the report is read by an anxious constituency the mayoralty struggle will be settled, to the great relief of an overstrained public mind.

Colonel Ingersoll on George's Theories.

From an Interview in the World.

"Several objections hav been urged, not to what Mr. George has done, but to what Mr. George has thought, and he is the only candidate up to this time against whom a charge of this character could be made. Among other things, he seems to hav entertained an idea to the effect that a few men should not own the entire earth; that a child coming into the world has a right to standing-room, and that before he walks, his mother has a right to standing-room while she holds him. He insists that if it were possible to bottle the air, and sell it as we do mineral waters, it would be hardly fair for the capitalists of the world to embark in such a speculation—especially where millions were allowed to die simply because they were not able to buy breath at 'pool' prices. Mr. George seems to think that the time will come when capital will be intelligent enough and civilized enough to be just, and when labor will be intelligent enough and civilized enough to take care of itself. He has a dream that poverty and crime and all the evils that go hand-in-hand with partial famin, with lack of labor, and all the diseases born of living in huts and cellars, born of poor food and poor clothing and of bad habits, will disappear, and that the world will be really fit to liv in. He goes so far as to insist that men ought to hav more than $23 or $24 a month for digging coal, and that they ought not to be compelled to spend that money in the store or saloon of the proprietor of the mine. He has also stated on several occasions that a man ought not to drive a street-car for sixteen or eighteen hours a day—that even a street-car driver ought to hav the privilege now and then of seeing his wife or at least one of the children awake. And he has gone so far as to say that a letter-carrier ought not to work longer in each day for the United States than he would for a civilized individual.

"To people who imagin that this world is already perfection; that the condition of no one should be bettered, except their own, these ideas seem dangerous. A man who has already amassed a million, and who has no fear for the future, and who says, 'I shall employ the cheapest labor and make men work as long as they can possibly endure the toil,' will regard Mr. George as an impractical man. It is very probable that all of us will be dead before all of the theories of Mr. George are put in practice. Some of them, however, may at some time benefit mankind; and so far as I am concerned, I am willing to help hasten the day, although it may not come while I liv. I do not know that I agree with many of the theories of Mr. George. I know that I do not agree with some of them. But there is one thing in which I do agree with him, and that is, in his effort to benefit the human race, in his effort to do away with some of the evils that now afflict mankind. I sympathize with him in his endeavor to shorten the hours of labor, to increase the well-being of laboring men, to giv them better houses, better food, and in every way to lighten the burdens that now bear upon their bowed backs. It may be that very little can be done by law, except to see that they are not absolutely abused; to see that the mines in which they work are supplied with air and with means of escape in time of danger; to prevent the deforming of children by forcing upon them the labor of men; to shorten the hours of toil, and to giv all laborers certain liens, above all other claims, for their work. It is easy to see that in this direction something may be done by law.

"I am an individualist instead of a Socialist. I am a believer in individuality and in each individual taking care of himself, and I want the government to do just as little as it can consistently with the safety of the nation, and I want as little law as possible—only as much as will protect life, reputation, and property, by punishing criminals and by enforcing honest contracts. But if a government givs privileges to a few, the few must not oppress the many. The government has no right to bestow any privilege upon any man or upon any corporation, except for the public good. That which is a special privilege to the few should be a special benefit to the many. And whenever the privileged few abuse the privilege so that it becomes a curse to the many, the privilege, whatever it is, should be withdrawn. I do not pretend to know enough to suggest a remedy for all the evils of society. I doubt if one human mind could take into consideration the almost infinit number of factors entering into such a problem. And this fact, that no one knows, is the excuse for trying. While I may not believe that a certain theory will work, still, if I feel sure it will do no harm, I am willing to see it tried."

"Do you think that Mr. George would make a good mayor?" asked the reporter.

"I presume he would," said Colonel Ingersoll. "He is a thoughtful, prudent man. His reputation for honesty has never, so far as I know, been called in question. It certainly does not take a genius to be mayor of New York. If so, there hav been some years when there was hardly a mayor. I take it that a clear-headed, honest man, whose only object is to do his duty, and with courage enough to stand by his conscience, would make a good mayor of New York or of any other city."

"Are you in sympathy with the workingmen and their objects?"

"I am in sympathy with laboring men of all kinds, whether they labor with hand or brain. The Knights of Labor, I believe, do not allow a lawyer to become a member. I am somewhat wider in my sympathies. No men in the world struggle more heroically—no men in the world hav suffered more, or carried a heavier cross, or worn a sharper crown of thorns, than those who hav produced what we call the literature of our race. So my sympathies extend all the way from hod-carriers to sculptors, from well-diggers to astronomers. If the objects of the laboring men are to improve their condition without injuring others; to hav homes and firesides, and wives and children—plenty to eat, good clothes to wear; to develop their minds, to educate their children—in short, to become prosperous and civilized, I sympathize with them, and hope they will succeed. I hav not the slightest sympathy with those who wish to accomplish all these objects through brute force. A Nihilist may be forgiven in Russia—may even be praised in Russia; a Socialist may be forgiven in Germany; and certainly a Home Ruler can be pardoned in Ireland, but in the United States there is no place for Anarchist, Socialist, or dynamiter. In this country the political power has been fairly divided. Poverty has just as many votes as wealth. No man can be so poor as not to hav a ballot; no man is rich enough to hav two, and no man can buy another vote, unless somebody is mean enough and contemptible enough to sell; and if he does sell his vote, he never should complain about the laws or their administration. So the foolish and the wise are on an equality, and the political power of this country is divided so that each man is a sovereign.

"Now, the laboring people are largely in the majority in this country. If there are any laws oppressing them, they should hav them repealed. I want the laboring people—and by the word 'laboring,' now, I include only the men that they include by that word—to unite; I want them to show that they hav the intelligence to act together, and sense enough to vote for a friend. I want them to convince both the other great parties that they cannot be purchased. This will be an immense step in the right direction.

"I hav sometimes thought that I would like to see the laboring men in power, so that they would realize how little, after all, can be done by law. All that any man should ask, as far as the government is concerned, is a fair chance to compete with his neighbors. Personally, I am for the abolition of all special privileges that are not for the general good. My principal hope of the future is the civilization of my race—the development not only of the brain but of the heart. I believe the time will come when we will stop raising failures, when we shall know something of the laws governing human beings. I believe the time will come when we will not produce deformed persons, natural criminals. In other words, I think the world is going to grow better and better. This may not happen to this nation nor to what we call our race, but it may happen to some other race, and all that we do in the right direction hastens that day and that race."

"Do you think that the old parties are about to die?"

"It is very hard to say. The country is not old enough for tables of mortality to hav been calculated upon parties. I suppose a party, like anything else, has a period of youth, of manhood and decay. The Democratic party is not dead. Some men grow physically strong as they grow mentally weak. The Democratic party lived out of office, and in disgrace, for twenty-five years, and lived to elect a president. If the Democratic party could liv on disgrace for twenty-five years, it now looks as though the Republican party, on the memory of its glory and of its wonderful and unparalleled achievements, might manage to creep along for a few years more."

Lectures and Meetings.

W. F. JAMIESON is having a series of successful meetings in Bozeman, Montana. He is engaged to speak in Helena, Wickes, and Dillon, Montana, from two to five lectures in each place. Address, Denver, Col.

CHARLES WATTS lectures for Friendship Liberal League, Philadelphia, in Industrial Hall, Broad and Wood streets, Sunday, Nov. 7th, at 2:30 PM.; subject, "If a Man Die Shall He Liv Again?—The Secularist Answer." At 7:30 P.M., subject, "Saints and Sinners—Which?" The Liberal public throughout the city and vicinity are cordially invited to cooperate to make these lectures a success. Seats are free.

Our London Letter.

When the Socialists were imprisoned for the technical offense of causing an obstruction in the public thoroughfares, but really for the act of openly promulgating their theories, there was great joyfulness on the part of their opponents, especially the religious portion of the community; but when, to make a show of consistency, a few rabid street preachers were served in the same manner, a considerable outcry was raised, and the denunciations of the peripatetic parsons' particular deity was invoked on the devoted heads of those daring individuals who presumed to interfere with his ministers. It really appears to be a great mistake for the authorities to interfere in such matters, but the persons in authority are not, as a rule, very conspicuous for common sense. It is certainly a nuisance to hav loud-mouthed orators holding forth under one's window; but as these individuals generally choose a spot where no one is annoyed in such a matter, they may just as well cater in this manner for the amusement of the masses. Street preaching is at times very amusing, and when any curious person is desirous of hearing how far lying may be carried on in the name of the Lord, he has a splendid opportunity of satisfying his curiosity. I was in a country town, a short time back, on a Sunday, and, walking out in the evening, was attracted by a crowd, who were listening to one of God's lay messengers. The one who was then speaking was of the usual prosy sort, and, as the audience was thinning out in consequence, a more lively brother was put on the stand. He was, according to his own statement, a regular Infidel-crusher, and was one of those numerous individuals before whom Atheists stand in awe. He stated that a short time ago he was at Northampton, when Charles Bradlaugh was sitting next to him on the platform, and when the former was commencing to speak against God, silenced him so effectually that he left the platform without proceeding further in his remarks. Exception was taken to this statement, and, as the liar was getting into an awkward corner, a devout sister helped him out of the difficulty by striking up a hymn, and the brother vanished; but as there was no appearance of a chariot of fire, I presume his disappearance was in a more matter-of-fact manner than in the case of Elijah.

Evidently matters in heaven are sadly out of gear, as all the late judgments appear to hav fallen upon the religious world as impartially as on the unbelievers. The effects of the Charleston earthquakes were perfectly indiscriminate; and a few days back an unfortunate priest appears to hav been specially singled out for speedy judgment. According to published accounts, the Rev. Kavanagh seems to hav been a decent sort of a man for his class, and it passes ordinary understanding why his head should hav been selected to receive a heavy stone cherub just when he was going through the performance of sacrificing on the altar. If he had been a sacrilegious heretic who was after stealing the church plate, the thing would hav been quite clear, but for a properly-authorized priest to be slain in that manner militates against all received notions of the fitness of things, and clearly shows there is something wrong somewhere. I suppose we must be content to leave it without explanation, believing that "what we don't know here we shall know hereafter," a highly satisfactory way of getting over such little difficulties.

There is some talk of forming a new Agnostic Society, of which, I presume, the Secular Review will be to a certain extent the literary mouthpiece. Doubtless there is plenty of room for such a society, and it is to be hoped it will be a success in every way; and it will tend in this direction better if it confines itself to anti-theology, excluding politics, as it is very certain all Freethinkers are not in accord on this point. Whether the name of a real live marquis as president will be of any real assistance remains to be seen. Perhaps it will be a draw, as the average "respectable" Englishman "dearly loves a lord."

VOLTAIRE'S old home at Ferney now belongs to a sculptor, who has preserved the philosopher's bedroom in its old state. The room contains a bedstead, table, and armchairs. On the walls are two pictures of Catherine of Russia and of Voltaire himself.

THE Labor Free Press, of Baltimore, in commenting upon the arrest of C. B. Reynold's at Boonton, says: "There are thousands of people in every Christian community who are so intolerant as to invoke the law where a party even claims the right of free speech. If a man sets up the claim that the devil really loves holy water, and would demonstrate that such is the case, let him go ahead and prove it if he can. And yet there are those who would call upon the public authorities to order so bold and bad a man to move on who should claim a privilege of proving in public that his satanic majesty could not consistently be held up as even a figurativ antithesis to the church. The man who will hav nothing but ex parte testimony is a bigot and a fool. We care not how much cramming he may hav been subjected to at one university or the other. A doctrin that cannot stand an argumentativ test, or whose adherents would suppress the utterance of the views of an opponent, would appear to be wanting in solidity in foundational structure."

Freethought in England.

II.—ITS ADVOCATES.

Since Mr. Charles Watts left England to make America the field of his activ labor, constructiv Secularism has found few advocates here, and—except, perhaps, the little I hav myself been able to do in some of my lectures—the destructiv policy has been invariably adopted by English Freethought lecturers.

With Mr. Watts's admirable qualities as an advocate of Freethought your readers are probably well acquainted. I may say, however, that in England he has many admirers, not alone of his impassioned and persuasiv eloquence as an orator, but for his many splendid qualities as a man.

To-day in England the editor of the Freethinker, Mr. Geo. William Foote, a—compara'ivly speaking—young man, wanting several years to forty, "holds the field," as Mr. Gladstone would say, as an essentially anti-theological lecturer.

Since he came out of Holloway jail, where he served twelve months for the horrible, priest-made offense called blasphemy, two years ago, he has been exceedingly activ with tongue and pen in spreading the glorious principles of Freethought.

Mr. Foote is a model speaker, though some regard him as slightly pedantic. His sentences are skilfully constructed, and being a man of fine literary tastes, and a wit to boot, his most profound lectures are rendered exceedingly interesting by his trenchant criticisms and caustic wit. As a debater he has few equals. Mr. Bradlaugh is finer in passages that appeal to the emotions; Mr. Watts has more fire; but Mr. Foote is the logician. One of the best read men in England, he makes the very best use of his knowledge; he is rigorously logical; is never mentally disturbed by excitement; and his speeches will bear the closest analysis when read.

His last debate with Wm. McCann, at the Hall of Science, showed him at his best. The Freethinker he conducts on the destructiv lines. Every week there appear cartoons that are wormwood and gall to the bigots.

But, as he frequently says himself, he does not ridicule persons, but principles. If the principles are true, ridicule will not hurt them, but if they are not so, so much the worse for them. Christianity he regards as a religion that has cursed the world by its supernatural teachings, by its absurdities and immoralities, and most of all by its crimes.

By every means in his power he has resolved to destroy its influence, and his lectures and writings are already playing such rare havoc with the creeds that the Christians sadly regret that they ever put him in jail to test of what metal he was really made.

Mr. Touzeau Parris is another very able Freethought advocate; but the method he adopts is not at all likely to bring him into conflict with the law authorities of the crown. Mr. Parris, who is very learned, was once a Unitarian minister, but, finding himself unable to believe in Theism in any of its manifold phases, came boldly out as an advocate of Materialism.

The Freethinkers of Birmingham and Camberwell swear by him. He is their bright particular star. One of Mr. Parris's favorit lectures i entitled, "Sin against God an Impossibility." The title shocks and wounds the Christians keenly, but when they hear the lecture they are amazed at the calm way in which the facts bearing on the subject are marshaled, and how accurate are the inferences drawn therefrom. Biblical criticism, however, is Mr. Parris's forte. There are few lecturers so well acquainted with the classics; and so, like Joseph Symes, now in Australia, when Mr. Parris lectures on the Bible he is often in a position to giv his opponents instruction as to the meaning of the various doubtful passages in the Old or New Testament by reference to either the Hebrew or the Greek text.

Mr. Parris, however, is more than a Biblical critic. He is an apostle of Herbert Spencer, and his lectures on the doctrin of evolution are invaluable as aids to young students desiring to hav a full grasp of the new teaching.

Mr. John Robertson, though a Freethinker of many years' standing, and an eminent litterateur, is new as a lecturer; but his expositions hav the great merit of clearness, and he is sure to win his way to success.

W. Stewart Ross ("Saladin") the editor of the Secular Review, is a man of remarkable powers; he is an excellent speaker, albeit he talks in a language not understood by the people, being largely made up of words that are not to be found in Johnson or Webster; and being a poet, besides a very vigorous writer, he is sometimes led into extravagance of language and eccentricity of ideas that deter many of the common-sense order of Freethinkers from regarding him as an authority. It cannot be denied, however, that in his literary labors he is supported by some of the most learned and talented gentlemen that ever lent the sanction of their names and support to our struggling cause.

Among the young lecturers of great promis are Mr. Arthur Hunt, of Nottingham; Mr. George Standring, Mr. W. H. Uttley, and, last but by no means least, two young ladies, Mrs. Mary Gowden and Miss Thornton Smith. There are, of course, other gentlemen who may be called auxiliary lecturers, such as Mr. Robert Forder, who, as the very activ secretary of the National Secular Society, does a lot of work gratuitously; and Mr. Frederick Haslam, a veteran, who has done some good service in his day, and who seems to be determined to carry on the fight against fearful odds until life will hold out no longer.

These are, if I mistake not, the whole of the chief talkers in the Freethought movement in England; the men who openly carry on the warfare with a barbarous theology; who clear the path that future Freethinkers may traverse the road to prosperity and happiness unimpeded by a false and pernicious creed.

Some of these warriors hav borne the brunt of the battle for many years; some hav pierced the insidious monster of religion more than once so that it has appeared to fall and writhe in agony; but anon, by the aid of wealth and power, it has risen again in all its hideousness and strength, and for awhile, by subtle persecution or by imprisonment, put some of our warriors hors de combat; but in a free and open encounter, which must take place with the progress of education and the growth of knowledge, who can hav any doubt as to the ultimate issue? Many of your readers may, perhaps, be amazed that in the old country there are not more Freethought lecturers than there are. The reason is this:

Young Freethinkers hav very little encouragement or help from the more wealthy members of the party, and, after years of weary struggle, in an unpopular movement, many of them are at length compelled by sheer poverty to retire from the work.

Now the field for their labor is growing wider and wider day by day, and when the English lecturer finds, as some of them hav found, that their efforts for human emancipation are more appreciated in other countries than their own, they naturally choose to work in those vinyards in which their labor is profitable alike to themselvs and those for whom they hav the pleasure to work. ARTHUR B. MOSS.

The Kansas Arrests.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I must confess to a feeling of amazement upon reading your brief comments following the announcement of the arrest of Lillian Harman and myself. But before proceeding to an examination of your remarks I will correct a few errors of fact.

1. Laura V. Walker procured a divorce from me, not I from her. I should hav regarded it as a violation of my principles to hav appealed to the courts for a separation. 2. Mr. M. Harman did not perform a "ceremony" of any kind. As the father of Lillian Harman, a minor, he gave his consent to our union, and he read a statement of principles. That was all. 3. Our preliminary examination was had on the 27th of September. Announcing it as for the 27th of October may hav been my fault—a slip of the pen—it is immaterial now.

You rightly observe that our "private affairs are no business of the public," but in the same sentence, with a strange inconsistency, you demand that "full information" thereof shall be given. And why? Because, forsooth, we appeal to the public for aid. But why do we make this appeal? Surely I do not need to tell you nor your readers that it is because there are those who believe, or pretend to believe, that they hav a right to make our "private affairs" the "business of the public;" and, proceeding upon that assumption, hav thrown us into prison and are doing their level worst to destroy our business and kill Lucifer. We were attending to our own business, injuring no one, when these prosecutors and persecutors made our business a matter of public knowledge and forced us to appeal to the better element of the public for assistance in vindicating our right to mind our own business, which you admit is no concern of the public. It was the business alone of Mr. Bennett and his customer (presumably an honest purchaser) when he mailed the copy of "Cupid's Yokes" that sent him to the Albany Penitentiary and made it possible for you to be the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. But most Christians, and a large minority of the Liberals, asserted that it was the business of the public, and, having the machinery of the law in their hands, they imprisoned him for thirteen months. We radical Liberals fought the issue to the last, and sent to Washington almost two hundred thousand names of men and women who demanded the release of the persecuted editor. In the little orthodox village of Norway, Iowa, I procured eighty signatures to the petition. Now, you, the successor of the martyr, D. M. Bennett, turn upon me when I, another Infidel editor, am arrested for making my own contract with a willing associate, and tell me that "there are other moral questions involved in this matter."

Do you not remember that that was precisely what Mr. Bennett's enemies averred when they published his letters? Did they not try to obscure the real issue by an attempt to make it appear that Mr. Bennett's moral character was bad? You know the story well. And so do all the old readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. And what did you, what did we all who stood by D. M. Bennett and THE TRUTH SEEKER then, reply to those charges? Did not you, did not Mr. Wakeman, did not Elizur Wright, did not every other true friend of liberty, declare that moral character was not the question at issue; that the sole question was Mr. Bennett's right to mail the proscribed pamphlet? Was not THE TRUTH SEEKER flooded with editorial and contributed articles whose purpose was to show that the humblest citizen should be protected in the exercise of his natural rights, and that it was far more dangerous to the rights of all to trample upon the liberties of the unpopular man than upon those of the rich and strong, and this because to oppress the weak always creates a precedent for further encroachment upon the rights and liberties of all.

Then, the issue is, hav Lillian Harman and I the right to make our own contracts? Every genuin Liberal will unhesitatingly answer, Yes. We are persecuted for exercising this right, and to our defense we called the Liberals of America. But had we, the old supporters of your paper, answered your and Mr. Bennett's appeals as you this day answer ours, there would be no TRUTH SEEKER for you to edit, or through which we could make this appeal.

You refer to the Kansas City Times and the "public press of the vicinity." You ought to know by this time how little dependence is to be placed in the utterances of the "public press." Hav you so soon forgotten the attitude of the Inter-Ocean and of the then Scribner's Monthly toward Mr. Bennett? Hav you forgotten the most wickedly unjust treatment he received at the hands of the editors of the country generally? Do you not know that the agent of the Associated Press who sends the dispatches from a given point has it in his power to put his opinions and prejudices into the mouth of every editor who receives those dispatches?

In this instance, R. E. Van Meter, editor of the New Era, the church and Prohibition organ of Valley Falls, is the Associated Press agent. He and his backers are determined to crush out the Infidel paper which has been a thorn in the side of orthodoxy there for six years. They hav threatened to prosecute the publishers for the alleged "obscenity" of the Light Bearer; and the New Era, since Van Meter succeeded to its management, has let pass no opportunity to misrepresent the paper and the principles of Freethought.

But you hav been unjust beyond the letter of that which is written in this and other Christian-run local papers. There is no warrant in their statement for your assumption that there are "other moral questions involved." To be sure they say that I hav a divorced wife, which is a fact, but how long since that became, per se, a crime?

Now, friend Macdonald, all I ask is that you once more justify your reputation for fairness, as you hav recently so effectually done in the case of the Chicago Socialists. It is all embraced, the issue, in this: Had Lillian and I the natural right to make the contract we did? Was it a wrong to arrest us for doing what you inferentially admit we had a right to do; and if our rights were invaded by that prosecution, hav we a claim upon the sympathy and assistance of the Liberals of the country? And that, too, without dragging out every skeleton, if such there are, in the Walker and Harman households? Yours for consistency and fair play, E. C. WALKER.

Cell 2, the Jail, Oskaloosa, Kan.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I begin to feel almost lonely, so many of my personal friends are either in jail, prison, under indictments, or sentenced to hang. Just think of it—what is this country coming to?

In Chicago the seven men, my co-laborers for the wage-slaves' liberation from the yoke that capitalism has fastened about their necks, from the heavy burdens moneyed monopolies hav compelled them to carry, from unjust legislation procured by corrupt means through political chicanery, now condemned to death for no act of theirs, except the expression of opinions, because some unknown person threw a bomb by which several policemen were killed. That the condemned knew anything about the throwing of that bomb was not even pretended to be proven, but the jury, selected for that purpose by parties knowing their prejudices, condemned them in response to the demands of capitalism, which controls legislation, the judiciary, and the press.

In our own city, some of the most self-sacrificing reformers are now in prison for inciting to riot when there was no riot.

We did hav a massacre here, a cowardly assault upon unarmed citizens who were doing no illegal act, simply marching in the street carrying an eight-hour banner; and Governor Rusk—called to this city by a railroad king, brought here in his private car, instead of in response to any call from city or county authorities—is responsible for the shedding of that blood. And now, upon the pretense that he saved the city from some dire disaster, he is being boomed for a third term, and the money powers of both parties are uniting under the pretense of sustaining "law and order," when the facts are that the only breach of law was by order of the governor to the militia to "shoot to kill"—without ordering them to disperse, or reading the riot act to them—the body of men fired upon. The mob had destroyed no property, injured no person. The Republican party is now trying to bulldoze every voter to sustain it by claiming all who do not are Anarchists—by which term they mean destructionists—and the capitalistic press all over the country sustains this infamously false issue.

And now comes from Kansas another cry of outraged liberty in the arrest and imprisonment of E. C. Walker and Lillian Harman, who married themselvs according to their own views of what was right, in a manner that would come under the law of civil contracts.

Who was harmed by their attending to their own business in their own way? All just legislation protects individual liberty, and interferes only in case of any encroachment thereon.

When civil law becomes a power to interfere with the sovereignty of the individual, doing as a state what if individually done would constitute a trespass, it at once becomes tyranny and dangerous, and should be resisted by every lover of liberty. Mr. Walker I hav known for years as a brave, true, logical reformer. He has his strong personal friends, and his bitter enemies, as hav all heroic souls; but the present question is not, What is Mr. Walker's character; but it is, Hav two persons a right to contract to liv together as conjugal partners, or must some meddlesome agent of the church or state be authority—and receive a fee for being such—more binding than personal agreement, and thus belittling individual responsibility?

The agreement on the part of Mr. Walker was such as would giv a woman personal existence and sexual liberty, which the laws do not, and it is man-made religions and man-made laws that condemn and punish persons for upholding the idea of equality between the sexes in rights, privileges, and responsibilities in marriage as the surest way of holding the race in bondage to the church power. Giv woman sex liberty, and a race of freemen would be born that no ecclesiastical yokes could bind, and no august laws fetter.

They are slaves who will not choose
Hatred, scoffing, and abuse,
Rather than in silence shrink
From the truths they needs must think;
They are slaves who dare not be
In the right with two or three.

JULIET H. SEVERANCE, M.D.

Milwaukee, Oct. 9, 1886.

Vote for Henry George.

Never before hav the wage-workers had the opportunity to so fully show the power of united organization and intelligent action as they will hav in this city in the next election for mayor. Let them not lose sight for one moment of the fact that the vast army of workingmen all over the country are watching them in the race, and if they win and elect Henry George for mayor, that success will be but the beginning of a general victory in all parts of the United States.

It is the duty of every intelligent workingman to strengthen every weak and doubting brother, to show him the fallacy of voting in either of the old parties, to point out to him, and prove it by facts, the greed, selfishness, and dishonesty of the average office-holder. This is easily done. On the other hand, show him that Henry George never sought the nomination, but that it was given to him in grateful acknowledgment of the great good he has done for the cause of Labor both by pen and tongue, and that in accepting the nomination, he is really sacrificing his own desires for the common benefit of the men for whose cause he has so ably and manfully battled in the past. What a real reform has already been achieved when it becomes possible for a man to be nominated for mayor who is owned by no "boss," and who has pulled no wires to secure it. This of itself ought to be a harbinger of victory. The principle of putting up $5,000 for election purposes, that may bring an opportunity to steal $50,000, has not been used in the nomination of Mr. George, and all the citizens of New York, irrespectiv of creed or condition, who wish to see a genuin reform in the administration of municipal affairs, should vote for Henry George. He is surely the first bona fide, simon-pure reformer ever nominated for that office.

An aroma of moral cleanliness seems to pervade the presentation of his name, and every citizen who wants a "clean government" should certainly support him.

Are not the newspapers of this city a sort of mixture of "Uriah Heeps" and "Aminadab Sleeks" in their treatment of municipal reform? Here is a man with an unspotted record, a large heart, whose generous sympathy is bounded by no country, creed, or sect, but who seeks the advancement of the toiling masses the world over by perfectly legitimate means, without war or confiscation; and how do the newspapers, who are so alert and sharp after municipal thieves, treat the nomination? For the most part with little or no notice of it whatever. The World doubts his ability to administer the office, and cites that as a valid objection to him, and assures its readers that his "philosophy" is immaterial, as his oath of office would be a bar against its practice. The question of ability to administer the office of mayor has not heretofore entered largely into the availability of previous candidates; the question generally has been, Who owns him? Which boss or which organization, and whither go the "spoils" in the event of success? That such an objection is pueril and unimportant goes without saying, and we merely quote it to show the kind of support that leading Democratic and labor loving newspaper is giving to the man and the cause of the workingmen, which it professes to champion. As a matter of fact, the newspapers of New York dare not advocate a labor mayor. It would be an innovation that would be distasteful, perhaps, to a large proportion of their subscribers and advertisers, and, per consequence, would affect their business. And just here is the touchstone that actuates the policy of newspapers, and which must be overcome by the circulation of pamphlets among voters. In regard to the executiv or administrativ ability of Mr. Henry George to perform the functions of mayor, it is enough to know that he is the author of "Social Problems" and the "Land Question," and that a man who could formulate such an original and sensible way out of existing evils is certainly possessed of brains enough to read the laws of the city, pass upon new legislations, and execute them faithfully in the interest of the whole people. Vote for Henry George for mayor! WM. ALLEN SMITH.

Do Not Vote for Henry George.

Let no Liberal expect much from Henry George, for he is "still in the gall of bitterness and the bond of" superstition. Somewhere in his "Progress and Poverty," he givs an example of the birth and growth of a new community. One man goes first and takes up a farm, then others come in and settle around him. Men of various trades and vocations come in one by one. At last, after the settlers hav begun to earn money, here comes the inevitable parson. Mr. George failed to giv the important lesson that one cause of poverty is that superstition induces people to giv part of their earnings to the clerical parasite to keep "God" from hurting them the first time the latter gets out of humor. Don't expect that Henry George, who lets the imaginary blood-sucker of superstition alone in an imaginary community, will do anything to rid New York of an army of ecclesiastical leeches.

In his conclusion he says: "The yearning for a further life is natural and deep. It grows with intellectual growth," etc. Then he propounds this conundrum: "What, then, is the meaning of life—of life absolutely and inevitably bounded by death?" And answers: "To me it only seems intelligible as the avenue and vestibule to another life." He agrees, then, with "Lo, the poor Indian," who "thinks, admitted to that equal sky, his faithful dog shall bear him company," for the dog has life and intellect. How Mr. George would please a certain turf-man, whose favorit book is Butler's "Analogy," because in proving that men are immortal he proves that horses are too!

Mr. George says that "the facts seem only explainable upon a theory which cannot be expressed but in myth and symbol," etc. What hope can the modern, everyday people of New York hav for aid in their troubles from a self-confessed groper among cobwebs? Science and Rationalism are the only hope, the only beacons. Do not expect anything from him who has not yet outgrown superstition. Do not vote for Henry George. W.

Judge Gary and the Prisoners.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Would it not please many of your readers to hav you publish the inclosed remarks of Judge Gary to the Anarchists when you hav another long article of sympathy in your paper for the convicts? I hope you will find room in your paper to giv the judge an equal chance. I know you will, for you are in search of truth, as the name of your paper implies.

Chicago, Oct. 12, 1886. J. S. BUTTERFIELD.

JUDGE GARY'S REMARKS ON SENTENCING THE ANARCHISTS.

I am quite well aware that what you hav said, although addressed to me, has been said to the world; yet nothing has been said which weakens the force of the proof or the conclusions therefrom upon which the verdict is based. You are all men of intelligence, and know that if the verdict stands it must be executed. The reasons why it shall stand I hav already sufficiently stated in deciding the motion for a new trial.

I am sorry beyond any power of expression for your unhappy condition, and for the terrible events that hav brought it about. I shall address to you neither reproaches nor exhortation. What I shall say shall be said in the faint hope that a few words from a place where the people of the state of Illinois hav delegated the authority to declare the penalty of a violation of their laws, and spoken upon an occasion so solemn and awful as this, may come to the knowledge of, and be heeded by, the ignorant, deluded, and misguided men who hav listened to your counsels and followed your advice. I say in the faint hope, for if men are persuaded that because of business differences, whether about labor or anything else, they may destroy property and assault and beat other men, and kill the police if they, in the discharge of their duty, interfere to preserve the peace, there is little ground to hope that they will listen to any warning.

It is not the least among the hardships of the peaceable, frugal, and laborious poor to endure the tyranny of mobs who, with lawless force, dictate to them, under penalty of peril to limb and life, where, when, and upon what terms they may earn a livelihood for themselvs and their families. Any government that is worthy of the name will strenuously endeavor to secure to all within its jurisdiction freedom to follow the lawful avocations and safety for their property and persons while obeying the law, and the law is common sense. It holds each man responsible for the natural and probable consequences of his own acts. It holds that whoever advises murder is himself guilty of the murder that is committed pursuant to his advice, and if men band together for a forcible resistance to the execution of the law, and advise murder as a means of making such resistance effectual, whether such advice be to one man to murder another, or to a numerous class to murder men of another class, all who are so banded together are guilty of any murder that is committed in pursuance of such advice.

The people of this country love their institutions, they love their homes, they love their property. They will never consent that by violence and murder those institutions shall be broken down, their homes despoiled, and their property destroyed. And the people are strong enough to protect and sustain their institutions. and to punish all offenders against their laws; and those who threaten danger to civil society, if the law is enforced, are leading to destruction whoever may attempt to execute such threats.

The existing order of society can be changed only by the will of the majority. Each man has the full right to entertain and advocate by speech and print such opinions as suit himself, and the great body of the people will usually care little what he says. But if he proposes murder as a means of enforcing, he puts his own life at stake. And no clamor about free speech, or the evils to be cured, or the wrongs to be redressed, will shield him from the consequences of his crime. His liberty is not a license to destroy. The toleration that he enjoys he must extend to others, and not arrogantly assume that the great majority are wrong, and may rightfully be coerced by terror, or removed by dynamite.

It only remains that for the crime you hav committed, and of which you hav been convicted after a trial unexampled in the patience with which an outraged people hav extended to you every protection and privilege of the law which you derided and defied, that the sentence of that law be given now.

In form and detail that sentence will appear upon the records of the court. In substance and effect it is that the defendant Neebe be imprisoned in the state penitentiary at Joliet at hard labor for the term of fifteen years.

And that each of the other defendants, between the hours of 10 o'clock in the forenoon and 2 o'clock in the afternoon of the 3d day of December next, in the manner provided by the statute of this state, be hung by the neck until he is dead. Remove the prisoners.

From the slip containing these remarks Mr. Butterfield tore off the words used by the judge in refusing the condemned a new trial. We supply the omission, merely calling attention to the fact that they show conclusivly, by the judge himself, that what we hav said is true, namely, that these men are condemned for being Anarchists, not because they are guilty of murder. Judge Gary said:

The case is unprecedented. There is no example of any such crime having been committed; there is no precedent of any case like this having become the subject of judicial investigation.

The jury were not instructed [by Gary himself] to find them guilty if they believed that they participated in the throwing of the bomb, or encouraged or advised the throwing of that bomb, or had knowledge that it was to be thrown, or anything of that sort. The conviction has not gone upon the ground that they did hav actual participation in the act which caused the death of Deegan, but upon the ground, under the instructions [given by Gary himself], that they had generally, by speech and print, advised a large class to commit murder, and had left the occasion, time, and place to the individual will, whim, and caprice of the individuals so advised, and that in consequence of that advice and in pursuance of it, and influenced by it, somebody not known did throw the bomb that caused Deegan's death.

Catholic Rascality and Infidel Honesty.

From the Cincinnati Post.

It is so unusual that a bondsman for a large sum comes forward and honestly pays up the full amount of his obligation that the action of George Hoadly, as bondsman of Assignee Mannix, in handing over to the present trustees of Archbishop Purcell the full amount of his equitable liability as bondsman, and in addition to that his share in $40,000 worth of property made over by Mannix to his four bondsmen to secure them, is worthy of public attention and public praise. Not that Judge Hoadly has done one whit more than his plain duty, or has more than simply satisfied, cent for cent, a voluntary contingent obligation he assumed when he put his name with those of John Holland, Chas. Stewart, and Michael Walsh on Mannix's bond for two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, but because at large sacrifice, and when legal evasion was possible, Judge Hoadly has preferred the act of honest duty. He is not a rich man, and in paying $62,500 cash he lays down nearly, or quite, half of the savings of an unusually laborious life.

Judge Hoadly, when governor, was often reproached with being an Infidel, if not an Atheist. In this act of financial righteousness he at any rate demonstrates that he sets a practical value upon that Biblical declaration, "A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things that he possesseth." A sense of duty fully done is cheap at any financial cost.

FREETHOUGHT lectures are delightfully frequent in America now. Ingersoll has been reposing lately, but other speakers hav been very activ. Mr. J. E. Remsburg, for instance, has just delivered thirty lectures in Minnesota and Wisconsin, and is gone on a fresh tour in Iowa. Mr. S. P. Putnam is as lively as ever. We fancy he must be a good-looking man, for he seems a favorit with the ladies.—London Freethinker.

Blasphemy.

REYNOLDS INDICTED FOR THE CRIME OF LIBELING A GHOST.

When the wisdom assembled as a grand jury of Morris county, N. J., "arose" on Tuesday, October 19, 1886, it left in the hands of the young district attorney, Willard W. Cutler, an indictment against Charles B. Reynolds for blasphemy. This instrument of torture, however, was not based upon Mr. Reynolds's lecture at Boonton, but upon a treatis which he has since written, printed as a pamphlet and distributed at Boonton, and which also appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 9th and 16th. The indictment reads as follows:

"MORRIS CO. OYER AND TERMINER AND GENERAL JAIL DELIVERY, Oct. TERM, A.D. 1886.

"Morris Co., to Wit:

"The grand inquest for the state of New Jersey in and for the body of the county of Morris upon their oath present that Charles B. Reynolds, late of the township of Boonton, in the county of Morris aforesaid, on the eighth day of October, 1886, at the township of Boonton aforesaid, in the county of Morris aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, unlawfully and wickedly did wilfully blaspheme the holy name of God by contumeliously reproaching his being and providence, and by contumeliously reproaching Jesus Christ and the holy word of God, that is, the canonical scriptures contained in the books of the Old and New Testaments, and by profane scoffing at and exposing them to contempt and ridicule in that he, the said Charles B. Reynolds, did then and there publish, circulate, and distribute a certain scandalous, impious, and blasphemous printed document entitled, 'Blasphemy and the Bible,' by Charles B. Reynolds, in which there were and are contained amongst other things certain scandalous, impious, and blasphemous matter, and things to the tenor and effect following:

"'This Bible describes God as so loving that he drowned the whole world in his mad fury, because it was so much worse than he (knowing all things?) ever supposed it could be. An all-wise, unchangeable God, who got out of patience with a world which was just what his own stupid blundering had made it, and knew no better way out of the muddle than to destroy it by drowning!'

"And in another part of the aforesaid printed document there are and was contained, among other things, certain other scandalous, impious, and blasphemous matter and things of the purport and effect following, to wit:

"'The Bible God says his people made him jealous, provoked him to anger, and now he will raise the mischief with them, for he declares his anger burns like hell. He will destroy them all "were it not that I feared the wrath of the enemy."

"'The almighty God afraid of his enemies! Can the human mind conceive of more horrid blasphemy? Can even a New Jersey Christian believe such stuff was ever inspired by a God?

"'WHAT THE BIBLE REALLY TEACHES.

"'The Old Testament records for our instruction in morals the most foul and bestial instances of fornication, incest, and polygamy, perpetrated by God's own pet saints, and the New Testament indorses these lecherous old wretches as examples for all good Christians to follow.'"

And in another part of the aforesaid document there were and are contained, among other things, certain other scandalous, impious, and blasphemous matter and things of the purport and effect following, that is to say:

"'Now, reader, take time and calmly think it over. A Jewish girl becomes the mother of God almighty—the mother of your God. The child of this young Jewess was God. Christ is God. God cried and screamed, squealed and kicked; God flung about his little arms; God made aimless dashes into space with his little fists; God stared foolishly at his own little toes; God smiled when he was comfortable and howled when pricked by a nasty pin; God was nursed at Mary's breast; God was wrapped in little diapers; God lay in a cradle and was rocked to sleep; God was quite sick when cutting his little teeth; God caught the measles, mumps, whooping cough, and scarlet fever; God learned to walk and often tumbled down, bumped his forehead, and made his little nose bleed; God was spanked when he was naughty, etc., etc.'

"Contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided and against the peace of this state, the government and dignity of the same.

"And the grand inquest aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present the said Charles B. Reynolds, late of the town of Boonton aforesaid, in the county of Morris aforesaid, on the 8th day of October, 1886, at township of Boonton aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, with force and arms disregarding the laws of the state, and profanely deriding and intending to bring the holy scriptures and the Christian religion into disbelief and contempt among the people of the state, unlawfully and wickedly did compose, print, and publish, and did cause and procure to be composed, printed, and published, a certain scandalous, impious, and blasphemous libel of and concerning God, and of and concerning the holy scriptures, and of and concerning the Christian religion, which libel is published and contained in a certain printed document, entitled 'Blasphemy and the Bible,' by Charles B. Reynolds, in which said libel so printed, published, and composed, and so caused and procured to be composed and printed and published as aforesaid by the said Charles B. Reynolds, the said Charles B. Reynolds did unlawfully blaspheme the holy name of God by denying and contumeliously reproaching his being and providence, and by contumeliously reproaching Jesus Christ and the Christian religion and the holy name of God.

"In one part of which scandalous and blasphemous libel, among other things, there were and are contained certain scandalous, impious, and blasphemous matter, and things of and concerning God, and of and concerning his providence, according to the purport and effect following, to wit:

"'This Bible describes God as so loving that he drowned the whole world in his mad fury, because it was so much worse than he (knowing all things?) ever supposed it could be. An all-wise, unchangeable God, who got out of patience with a world which was just what his own stupid blundering had made it, and knew no better way out of the muddle than to destroy it by drowning!'

"And in another part of said libel there were and are contained certain scandalous, impious, and blasphemous matter, and things of and concerning God, of and concerning his being, and of and concerning the holy scriptures, and of and concerning the Christian religion, and to the purport and effect following, to wit:

"'The Bible God says his people made him jealous, provoked him to anger, and now he will raise the mischief with them; for he declares his anger burns like hell. He will destroy them all "were it not that I feared the wrath of the enemy."

"'The almighty God afraid of his enemies! Can the human mind conceive of more horrid blasphemy? Can even a New Jersey Christian believe such stuff was ever inspired by a God?

"To the great scandal and contumelious reproach of God, his being and providence, and of Jesus Christ and the Christian religion and the holy word of God, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of the state, the government and dignity of the same. WILLARD W. CUTLER, Prosecutor, etc.

This change of base on the part of the Christians of New Jersey is a complete surprise to Mr. Reynolds. When the fanatics of Boonton arrested him on July 28th, he was indignant, and the most natural thing for him to do, it seemed, was to enlighten the people of that place as to what blasphemy laws are, and as to who are the real blasphemers. The first was done by circulating a pamphlet upon blasphemy, in which was pointed out the unconstitutionality, the barbarism, and the foolishness of such laws; the second by another pamphlet showing that Christians and their Bible were the real blasphemers, inasmuch as they ascribe to God sentiments, passions, and attributes which degrade him to the level of a Nero—an inhuman and bloodthirsty monster. This pamphlet, called "Blasphemy and the Bible," shows that the Bible is God's worst enemy, and that, in circulating the book, Christians are destroying his good character. And this it is that makes the Christians of Morris county angry. Owing to the stupidity of the complainant and the justice who drew up the first complaint against Mr. Reynolds, the grand jury could find no ground for an indictment. The witnesses they summoned could not recollect enough of Mr. Reynolds's lecture to work upon. To be revenged, therefore, they pounced upon this pamphlet, and, selecting the passages quoted in the indictment, and without specifying the object of the pamphlet, they find a "true bill" against Mr. Reynolds. The malicious wreckers of his tent are allowed to go free—the district attorney refusing to call even one of the long list of witnesses Mr. Reynolds left with him for that purpose—while he is prosecuted upon a totally different charge, the obliging district attorney summoning some fifty witnesses against him. This, we suppose, is a Christian conception of justice.

The first notice Mr. Reynolds had that he was indicted he read in the daily papers of this city on Wednesday, the 20th. He at once telegraphed to the district attorney to know if this was so, if he was wanted to renew his bail, and the amount of bail required. To this the district attorney returned no answer. A personal call upon Mr. Cutler succeeded better, and Friday, the 22d, Mr. Reynolds gave bail to appear on Monday, the 25th, to plead to the indictment. Saturday Mr. Ingersoll telegraphed to the district attorney, but to this message no answer was returned. Mr. Ingersoll has but just undergone a surgical operation to remove an obstruction from his throat, and under direction of his physicians must not speak above a whisper. The mere statement of these facts ought to hav been sufficient to secure an adjournment, but when Mr. Reynolds appeared in the court on Monday morning, and gave bail to appear for trial, Mr. Cutler moved that Wednesday, the 27th, be the day fixed. Mr. Reynolds told Judge Childs that it was impossible for his counsel to appear at that time. "That makes no difference," said the judge; "get other counsel!" And he persisted in setting the day for trial as Wednesday, the 27th, at half-past twelve.

Morristown is as orthodox a place as Boonton, and the ire of its inhabitants runs high against the Infidel. When Mr. Reynolds was distributing his pamphlets upon its streets he was threatened with arrest and ordered to stop by the marshal of the place. Whatever jurymen are drawn from Morristown are likely to be intensely prejudiced against the defendant. One of the grand jury men who indicted Mr. Reynolds said to a Liberal of Boonton that Mr. Reynolds should if possible secure a change of venue and remove the trial to another county. "He stands no chance in Morristown," said the grand jury man. This seems to be the opinion of all the Christians of both Boonton and Morristown—that Mr. Reynolds is as good as convicted. In their imaginations they hav already heard the ruling of the judge that will force the jury to convict; hav seen the jury rise and say, "He is guilty;" hav seen the officer remove the prisoner to the jail just back of the court house; hav heard the jailer's harsh commands and the slam of the iron doors as the victim vanished from the sight of his friends—in their imaginations they hav heard this, and then gone home and thanked God for his great mercy.

Morristown is essentially a Christian town, and a sleepy one except when its people are mad. It is some thirty miles from New York, but a New Yorker going there imagins it to be a good deal farther away than that. It is a pretty place, up among the hills, and for this reason a good many New York business men liv there, coming in to business every day. Morristown makes a good bedchamber. The atmosphere is conduciv to sleep. A visitor feels as though he were in a church or graveyard with a funeral under way. Outside of their religion the inhabitants worship nothing so heartily as a lot of Revolutionary relics shelved and labeled in an old house where George Washington once made his headquarters. A contemplation of ancient times just suits the Morristown folks, and if they could whip a few witches through the street or hang them to the liberty pole on the common their happiness would no doubt be greatly enhanced. It is a first-rate place for an Infidel who values his liberty to keep away from.

The physical condition of Colonel Ingersoll precluding the possibility of his undertaking to conduct the case, in which he would hav to talk perhaps for hours, other counsel were sought. Tuesday was spent by Mr. Reynolds in visiting the best lawyers of

New Jersey, but not one was found who could attend to the matter. Charles Winfield, district attorney of Jersey City, Judge Garrison, of the same place, and other distinguished legal lights, were offered retainers, but to no avail. Tired, discouraged, wet from the constantly falling rain, and about half sick, Mr. Reynolds made up his mind that he would be pushed into jail before he was forty-eight hours older, and telegraphed to New York that the opinion of all the lawyers was that only Mr. Ingersoll himself could save him.

Wednesday morning was rainy, and it was at great risk to himself that Colonel Ingersoll took an early train for Morristown, accompanied by Dwight Townsend, one of the prominent men of this city. An assault and battery case occupied the attention of the court till nearly eleven, when Colonel Ingersoll rose and said he wanted to make a motion before the court in the case of the State against C. B. Reynolds. The motion was that in view of the fact that only just then had he seen the indictment against Mr. Reynolds, and as last week he had had a surgical operation performed upon his throat, so that until last Sunday he was able to speak only in a whisper, as his physician positivly forbade him to try any case lest he should permanently lose his voice, as Mr. Reynolds was only notified on Monday of the time set for trial, and as he himself was not notified till Tuesday, when he at once used all possible endeavor to obtain other counsel, in which he failed, he desired that the case might stand over to the next term of court.

The court asked what action the prosecutor proposed to take in the matter. Mr. Cutler, after some hesitancy, opposed. The court, with marked fairness, said that though the court had always held that the employment of distinguished counsel whose time was generally occupied was no ground for adjournment, this case seemed different. Counsel had evidently made every endeavor to procure other distinguished counsel, and under the circumstances he would rule that the defendant could not be deprived of his constitutional right to counsel of his own selection, and he would, therefore, order the case adjourned to the next term, the third Tuesday in January.

Bail having been renewed by Edwin Worman, Mr. Reynolds was at liberty to shake the mud of New Jersey from his feet once more, and he returned to New York.

And so the battle is still to be fought. It is very evident that the desire of the people of Boonton and Morristown is that Mr. Reynolds shall be placed behind prison bars as speedily as possible, and, had the court not taken the sensible and humane ground it did, he would undoubtedly at the present time be a convicted prisoner, doing hard labor in a penitentiary. Mr. Reynolds's reliance must be upon the ability of his counsel and the fairness of the court, and not upon any merciful public sentiment of the people of Morris county. The rabble cry, "Crucify him! crucify him!"

The Kansas Arrests.

In another column will be found a letter from Mr. E. C. Walker bearing slightly upon the subject of his recent marriage to Lillian Harman, and bearing down a good deal upon the much-belectured editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mr. Walker misconstrues the language used a week or two since by THE TRUTH SEEKER, and brings in issues in no wise parallel to his case. Upon these he has wasted a good deal of unnecessary indignation.

The position of Mr. Walker and Miss Harman, as we learn by Lucifer, is that they are married, as solidly as anyone, and that they had a natural and legal right to marry as they chose. In taking this position they place themselvs upon firm ground. In the United States a general common law prevails which bases marriage upon contract, upon the present mutual consent of the parties, and no special forms are necessary to its validity. If a man and woman, by words of present import, promis and agree with each other to be husband and wife, the contract and the resulting status of marriage are perfected. It is not necessary for a magistrate or any officer of the state to be present—even witnesses are not necessary—neither is it necessary that the woman assume the man's name. Whenever certain preliminary steps, such as license, notice, and the like, are prescribed by statute—so runs the ponderous legal statement—a failure to comply with these provisions does not impair the marriage which has been contracted; it simply subjects the delinquent parties to a penalty. But the words of the contracting parties must be of present force and operation. These conditions were all fulfilled in the contract between Mr. Walker and Miss Harman, and though he has denied that any ceremony was performed, the record disproves his assertion. The following is the official account of the "autonomistic marriage" taken from Lucifer:

"E. C. Walker, as one of the contracting parties, made the following statement:

"'This is a time for clear, frank statement. While regarding all public marital ceremonies as essentially and ineradicably indelicate, a pandering to the morbid, vicious, and meddlesome element in human nature, I consider this form the least objectionable.

"'I abdicate in advance all the so-called "marital rights" with which this public acknowledgment of our relationship may invest me. Lillian is and will continue to be as free to repulse any and all advances of mine as she has been heretofore. In joining with me in this love and labor union, she has not alienated a single natural right. She remains sovereign of herself, as I of myself, and we severally and together repudiate all powers legally conferred upon husbands and wives.

"'In legal marriage, woman surrenders herself to the law and to her husband, and becomes a vassal. Here it is different—Lillian is now made free.

"'In brief, and in addition: I cheerfully and distinctly recognize this woman's right to the control of her own person; her right and duty to retain her own name; her right to the possession of all property inherited, earned, or otherwise justly gained by her; her equality with me in this copartnership; my responsibility to her as regards the care of offspring, if any, and her paramount right to the custody thereof should any unfortunate fate dissolve this union. And now, friends, a few words especially to you. This wholly private compact is here announced, not because I recognize that you, or society at large, or the state, hav any right to inquire into or determin our relations to each other, but simply as a guarantee to Lillian of my good faith toward her. And to this I pledge my honor.'

"Lillian Harman then responded as follows:

"'I do not care to say much; actions speak more clearly than words, often. I enter into this union with Mr. Walker of my own free will and choice, and I agree with the views of my father and of Mr. Walker, as just expressed. I make no promises that it may become impossible or immoral for me to fulfil, but retain the right to act, always, as my conscience and best judgment shall dictate. I retain, also, my full maiden name, as I am sure it is my duty to do.

"'With this understanding, I giv to him my hand in token of my trust in him and of the fidelity to truth and honor of my intentions toward him.'

"Then Mr. Harman said:

"'As the father and natural guardian of Lillian Harman I hereby giv my consent to this union. I do not "giv away the bride," as I wish her to be always the owner of her person, and to be free always to act according to her truest and purest impulses, and as her highest judgment may dictate.'

"Then followed the usual congratulations."

In the introduction to this, it is called the "civil compact entered into between Lillian Harman and Edwin C. Walker, on Sunday, the 19th of September, 1886, of the common calendar."

That this marriage is good at common law there is no doubt. Marriage being clearly intended, any stipulations inconsistent with the law are simply void. An agreement to liv together for life will suffice (Roche vs. Washington, 19 Indiana Rep. 53, 57), though so extended an agreement is not necessary, as the law may allow divorce (Stewart's Marriage and Divorce, sec. 85). The only question is whether the statutes of Kansas made the marriage void. Those laws are as follows: Chap. 61, sec. 1, Compiled Laws of Kansas: The marriage contract is to be considered in law as a civil contract, to which the consent of the parties is essential, and the marriage ceremony may be regarded as a civil ceremony or a religious sacrament; but the marriage relation shall only be entered into, maintained, or abrogated as provided by law. Sec. 12 of same chapter provides that:

"Any persons living together as man and wife within this state without being married shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined in a sum not less than five hundred nor more than one thousand dollars, or be imprisoned in the county jail not less than thirty days, nor more than three months."

Sec. 5 provides a form of license to be issued by the probate judges, and sec. 10 provides that every judge, justice of the peace, or licensed preacher of the gospel may perform the marriage ceremony, and for the return of a certificate thereof to the probate judge granting the license. Sec. 4 provides that "if any person empowered by law to join others in marriage shall marry any person before a license, issued by the probate judge of the proper county, under his official hand and seal, be produced, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," etc. Nowhere does the statute expressly prescribe that a marriage shall be void for non-compliance with any of these sections.

Upon the question, in the absence of decisions of Kansas courts, we hav as authority the decision in the case of Meister vs. Moore, 96 United States Rep., 79. In that case the court held as follows:

"No doubt a statute may take away a common law right, but there is always a presumption that the law has no such intention, unless it be plainly expressed. A statute may declare that no marriages shall be valid unless they are solemnized in a prescribed manner, but such an enactment is a very different thing from a law requiring all marriages to be entered into in the presence of a magistrate or a clergyman, or that it be preceded by a license or publication of banns, or be attested by witnesses. Such formal provisions may be considered as merely directory, instead of being treated as destructiv of a common-law right to form the marriage relation by word of present assent. . . . Whatever directions they may giv respecting its formation or solemnization, courts hav usually held a marriage good at common law to be good notwithstanding the statutes, unless they contain express words of nullity."

Since Mr. Walker wrote the article which appears in this issue he has been before a Kansas court, and the decision of the judge sustains this view of the case. The judge held that should either Mr. Walker or Miss Harman marry again they could be prosecuted for bigamy, but yet held that they can be punished for having lived together without first obtaining a license and then being married by some one legally authorized to perform the ceremony. This is no doubt law, but the infliction of the penalty for violating the law as to licenses does not affect the validity of the marriage. The parties to the marriage now claim that they hav not violated a Kansas law. In the trial before Judge Crosier, Mr. Harman said, in answer to a question put by the state's attorney:

"I am the father and only living parent of Lillian Harman, one of the defendants. She will be seventeen years old in December next. Edwin C. Walker, the other defendant, is associated with me in editing the paper called Lucifer. I was present at the autonomistic marriage of these two persons on the 19th of September, and gave my consent thereto. There was no magistrate, clergyman, or other officer of church or state present. Not having any use for church or state officials none such had been summoned or invited. The parties married themselvs in their own way, retaining or recognizing all that we deem good in marriage, as commonly understood, and eliminating that which we deem immoral, or that which may in the future result in immorality. There was no license from probate court exhibited on this occasion. We regard the license and civil officer as non-essential to marriage—that these formalities are directory to the officers and not prohibitory as against us. We claim that we hav violated no law of Kansas."

As this seemed to be a change of base, the district-attorney asked Mr. Walker how long since he made that claim. The attorney for Mr. Walker objected to this question, and the court sustained the objection. In Lucifer, however, Mr. Harman explains the position of the parties in this wise:

"We hav said that we ignore the technicalities of the statute law in this matter, claiming, as we do, that 'marriage is a civil contract, in which the consent of the parties is essential,' as stated by the statute itself; and as nothing else is stated to be essential we legitimately infer that nothing else is essential to marriage in Kansas. To vindicate and maintain principles we may in future find it necessary to disobey and even to defy statute law, as Abolitionists disobeyed and defied statute law, but we do not think this alternativ has yet been presented to us."

Under instructions of the judge the jury found the defendants guilty. Sentence was reserved, and meantime the proper steps are being taken to carry the case to the Supreme Court of Kansas.

As the marriage is acknowledged by all parties, including the court, to be a perfectly valid marriage, the question resolves itself to this: Should Mr. Walker and Miss Harman be punished for not getting a license and being married in the regular way? This is answered by common law and common sense in the negativ. Marriage, in this country, is, as we hav pointed out, distinctly and solely a civil contract. The decision of all the courts are to this effect, including the United States Supreme Court. The New York courts hav repeatedly decided in this way. Even in Rhode Island, one of the most conservativ of states, in a case argued by General Butler, the court held marriage to be merely a civil contract, to which not even witnesses were necessary. In the case of Leo Miller and Mattie Strickland the Supreme Court of Michigan affirmed the lower court's decision (under which the parties were imprisoned) upon a technical error, not upon the merits of the case. Miller was his own counsel, and had the proverbial client. Had he properly put the records of the case before the Supreme Court, the lawyers of Michigan assert that the decision would hav been reversed.

The action of the Kansas judge is morally tyrannical and indefensible. In an appeal to the public Mr. Walker and Miss Harman state very clearly the position they hold. They say:

"We claim that the agreement of a man and woman to liv together as husband and wife, and their so living together as husband and wife, constitutes a valid marriage, all licenses, ceremonies, etc., etc., being non-essentials. From the directory statutes we appeal to natural rights, to the common law, to decisions of higher courts, all of which run parallel with our line of defense."

In this claim the defendants are in the right, the law clearly allows it, and if the court does not so award it, upon the officers of the court, not upon the defendants, will rest the responsibility of sustaining what they call immorality. If the judges of Kansas desire to preserve the "peace and dignity of the state" they will promptly decree that E. C. Walker and Lillian Harman are married as solidly as if they had signed a marriage certificate, declare their arrests illegal, and do what they can to repair the gross injustice perpetrated upon them. Such actions as those of the complainants and persecutors in this case do more to bring law into contempt than all that Mr. Walker and Miss Harman could say in a lifetime. If Mr. Walker had taken the pains, in his first brief note to us, to giv all the facts in their case, his indignant letter, and all the subsequent discussion, would hav been unnecessary. When all these facts are known there cannot be two opinions among law-abiding and liberty-loving people.

Letters from Friends.

SNOHOMISH CITY, WASH. TER., Oct. 8, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10.50—$10 for five new subscribers, papers to be sent as per inclosed list, and 25 cents to pay for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL you sent me last winter.

I find this a very Liberal community, and all necessary to organize a union here is an organizer. The five subscribers I send you are in favor of the illustrations; so keep on with the good work. J. S. MARTIN.

DALLAS, TEX., Oct. 11, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Yesterday, in the Dallas Opera House, Mr. W. S. Bell, of Chicago, delivered to an attentiv audience his lecture upon "Individuality." It was given under the auspices of the Secularists of this place. Mr. Bell's exposition of his position on the subject had the true logical ring about it, as was attested by the frequent applause of his hearers.

From here Mr. Bell went to Waco, via Fort Worth, where he will remain a few days maturing plans for a thorough campaign in this state. GEO. CRETIEN, Secretary Dallas Secular Society, No. 810 Main street.

AXTELL, KAN., Sept. 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I desire a few words regarding the orthodox churches. They hav, in the opinion of many Liberals, struck upon a capital plan to check the Freethought wave that is now passing over the world. And their plan, undoubtedly, is to publish Freethought-Anarchistic journals; and if the Liberals do not thoroughly understand their scheme of Freethought-freelove-Anarchistic journals, the orthodox will surely succeed. A Liberal, after reading the Word, of Princeton, Mass., or Lucifer, of Valley Falls, Kan., would naturally exclaim, "If that is what Freeethought is coming to, I do not want any!" THOS. E. CONE.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., Oct. 18, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been reading Mr. Reynolds's article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 16th. I must say that good and noble man is doing more for the human race than all the priests hav ever done in past or present. I hope the time is not far distant when the people will acknowledge him as their leader, and Secularism as their savior; as these, and these alone, can only work true righteousness among the people. If the people of New Jersey would invite him to come among them, and discard their hireling priests, they would work a lasting benefit to themselvs and the world at large. Yours for good to the whole human race.

CHARLES SACH.

CLAYTONIA, COL., Oct. 11, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find 75 cents, for which send me THE TRUTH SEEKER for three months. In that time I hope I shall hav money enough to spare for one year's subscription.

My attention was called to your position on the industrial question by G. W. Brown, M.D., who bewailed your liberal position in that respect, at the same time praising the editor of the Ironclad Age for his illiberal sentiments regarding Anarchy and Socialism. Now, I utterly fail to see any liberality in the article in the Ironclad Age quoted by Brown, M.D., except in Billingsgate and misrepresentation. In that respect it is a little more than liberal—it is extravagant! But I must thank the M.D. for letting me know of one Liberal editor who thinks more of truth and justice than of his pocket-book! THORJUS RINDEN, Miner.

DOYLESTOWN, PA., Oct. 18, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3.00 for renewal of my subscription and 30 cents for three copies of Colonel Ingersoll's speech in the telegraph suit. I hav read with interest your editorials on the subject of Anarchy, and think you are making a sorry mess of the business. I take it that what your dissenting patrons would like you to explain, and quit dodging so industriously, is whether you are in favor of free speech when it advocates murder, arson, or theft.

Yours, etc., FRANK R. HART.

[A man has a perfect right, under the Constitution, to advocate murder, arson, and theft; but if murder, arson, or theft follow from, and as a result of, his advocacy, then he is held as an accessory and accomplice, and is punished accordingly; and such punishment is, in our opinion, exceedingly just. A man who induces another to commit a crime is particeps criminis. Such is what our Constitution means in guaranteeing free speech, with responsibility for its abuse. If this is a "sorry mess," the founders of the Republic are to blame, not the undersigned.—ED. T. S.]

ST. STEPHEN, N. B., Oct. 9, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5, which you will please giv me credit for on account of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav now read it for over a year, and could no more think of doing without it than without food. I admire the illustrations very much. When THE TRUTH SEEKER comes to the printing office where I am foreman, the wrapper is generally removed from it without my help, and not only the editor takes a glance at the pictures, and also at the liberal bill of fare which reaches me weekly, but numerous visitors of the orthodox kind, including a Methodist preacher, who says that he used to get it years ago. It evidently did not do him much good—not as much as, I am glad to say, its perusal has done me. For twenty years I was a member of the Presbyterian church, but for the last year I hav withdrawn from it, and, with my wife and family (thirteen of us, all told), go to the Unitarian-Universalist church. If the mass of mankind would only read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and do a little thinking for themselvs, what a depletion would take place in the ranks of the Christian church! J. C. HENRY.

KIRKSVILLE, MO., Oct. 5, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I thought I would pen a few lines at this time concerning the state of affairs here among the Liberals. Many years ago we organized a Liberal society, embracing Spiritualists and other Liberals; and in 1883 we reorganized under the state law; yet over a year ago we suspended our meetings; and when they will resume I cannot tell. The only cause I can giv for suspension is poverty among its members, a few having to bear the whole expense for hall-rent and speakers. We hav had nearly all the most noted public speakers of the country here belonging to the Liberal ranks, male and female, Spiritualistic and Materialistic, besides others with not so wide a reputation, yet good. Last Sunday evening a good audience listened to W. S. Bell in the Opera Hall on "Liberty and Morality," a discourse embracing two important points affecting the welfare of humanity. Mr. Bell handled the subject well, and brought to light many truths unthought of before by many. Mr. Bell should be kept continually employed, and he should be properly remunerated, for he is doing good work. WM. HART.

COLFAX, WASH. TER., Oct. 5, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1.50, for which send me Miss Wixon's romance, "All in a Lifetime."

We do so much enjoy reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, as well as all other good Freethought literature. Living as we do so far from lectures, conventions, etc., the reading of them sometimes almost makes us envious. I hope the time is not far distant when your stirring lecturers will find their way as far west as we liv. Our young son, aged twenty, thinks if Helen Gardener would deliver only one lecture in Colfax she would certainly settle or badly cripple all the churches here. It does look as though Freethought argument, such as we are receiving now in such abundance, would convince every thoughtful mind. And it is having its effect, and that right in the churches. They begin to feel that the club of fear they hav so long wielded with such an unsparing hand is fast slipping from them.

Mr. Putnam's tour in the West was highly entertaining. And the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER are amusing as well as instructiv; whole volumes contained in some of them.

KATE P. WOLFARD.

O'BRIEN, FLA., Sept. 19, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $1 for "The Brain and the Bible," by Edgar C. Beall.

A great amount of capital is being made out of the earthquake shock here. Not satisfied with that, the preacher has offered up a prayer that another may come and destroy one-half of the sinners so he can convert the other half; and all who are left of the other half unconverted he could look down and smile upon in hell. This minister, the Rev. Castlebary, can shout like a demon when he gets warmed up. He has plenty of cheek, too, and if the report be true, as is generally believed in this place, he has been unduly intimate with the deacon's daughter, and would not marry her as her mother wished him to.

A preacher in Atlanta, Ga., from the North, wrote to the Michigan Christian Advocate that the South could not part with the negro. He was advancing and would yet possess the land "the Lord thy God giveth thee"—quoting scripture. That is a good way to sow seeds for a war between the black and white, teaching that the Lord delivered the negro from slavery; that the whole South is theirs by inheritance, and that the white man is keeping from him what rightfully belongs to the negro. That is a good way, too, to perpetuate a hatred between the races. No wonder a negro will not pay a white man a debt if he can avoid it. They will take the South as the Israelites did the land of Canaan. Such teaching as that is what has made a hell on earth for hundreds of years. E. H. CAMERON.

MARION, N. Y., Oct. 17, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Here is a draft on the First National Bank of Palmyra for $5—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year, and $2 for our friend, Mr. C. B. Reynolds, to help buy freedom in this blessed free country. I wrote him a letter soon after the affair at Boonton, promising to help him, and I hope that every Liberal will do all in his power toward the cause of individual freedom. Mr. Reynolds pitched his tent in this village last summer under very discouraging circumstauces. Only a few dared assert their views on account of family jars sure to follow. No one was here to offer him the hospitality of a home, and while the village was full of sacred loafers, delegates to a Sunday-school convention, sponging their living from private families, Mr. Reynolds had to stop at a hotel. He worked hard here and made several friends—one, at least, that is willing to help him. Among the sixteen to twenty Sunday-school sacred loafers not one dared to face him in debate. What a valiant host the Lord Jesus will hav to lead to conquer the world! Mrs. Reynolds, too, made some very fine points in her evening discourse; bore rather hard on Uncle Abe and Mr. Lot.

Now, Mr. Editor, keep right on, and don't mind what some old moss-backs say. Speak your mind freely, and if we don't all agree on important events that are taking place, we can't afford to giv up a good paper on that account. I am a New England mechanic. I fully agree with your editorial about the Chicago men, as do four-fifths of the laboring classes. If it is right to hang these men, is it not just as fair to hang a manufacturer for putting up machinery that kills men? I hav seen men crushed to death, caught in heavy gearing, or wound up in belts and fast revolving pulleys. No one to blame. The religious press hav roared for these men's lives, and the capitalist press hav followed. I belong to no labor organization or secret society, but I do belong to the party that has reason and justice for its motto.

You may count on me for a life subscriber. I am satisfied that the illustrations should be continued. I enjoy a good laugh, and I always smile "out loud" when I look at them. I found THE TRUTH SEEKER in poor company last week—in between the New York Christian Advocate and the Northern Advocate. I wish Watson Heston could get up a picture entitled "Talmage's Workshop"—building boats after Noah's patent. When I read his sermons I think of what the New York Sun said of him, a few years ago—that there were boys in New England twelve years old who knew more of grammar than the Rev. Talmage. Certainly, there are plenty of that age who hav more good, hard, sound sense than this sacred idiotical actor. JOSEPH E. COY.

SHAWANO, WIS., Oct. 10, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: We had Remsburg for three of his sledge-hammer lectures last month, which were the first Liberal lectures ever given here. They gave great satisfaction to large audiences, one including the Methodist preacher, who set an example of liberality that most church-members dare not follow. Two or three little things happened that go to show how afraid Christians are to hav people hear Liberal lectures, and get some glimpses of truth, which they never get in the church. Notice was given in the local papers and by handbills that the lectures would be free, but it was reported that this was a dodge to get people into Music Hall, when an admission would be demanded for lights and hall rent. This kept several away from the first lecture.

Old Sol Stevens, who is noted for honesty and a good deal of good common-sense, but, unfortunately, cannot read, asked a good Christian lady friend (he won't tell her name) what the handbills were, and what the lectures were to be about, and she told him, "Oh! it's nothing but some old Spiritualist, and you don't want to go near him."

"Ah! indeed," he replied, "if that is so, I shall go any how, for I hav heard you say so much against Spiritualism that I want to hear what can be said for it," and he went. The next day old Sol was heard to remark, using his favorit cuss words: "Why, condemn it! they tried to keep me away, but I wouldn't hav missed them three lectures for $5, although I didn't hear a word about Spiritualism, one way nor t'other."

Because Mayor Breed presided at one of the meetings, and introduced the lecturer, it is to be used by the pious saints as a cudgel against him in running for a county office. Such is the liberality of the creed-bound. One of the local papers that had given notice of the lectures virtually apologized in an attempted criticism, and the other one failed to get up courage enough to refer to them at all, as the editor could not say a word, in truth, against anything that was said. Remsburg is an electric light in the Liberal cause.

W. S. WOOD.

LINCOLN, ILL., Sept. 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to say a word to our friends. I was just thinking of "then and now." It was way back in the forties that, as a boy, I used, in Ohio, to sit on a puncheon slab seat and listen to various peripatetic Bible whangers. With gyrating hands they held poor ignorant sinners over hell—glowing with livid fire and smelling of brimstone. They poured in the fuel with agility, fairly by wholesale, until the weak-minded trembled and wondered how such oratory and knowledge could be handled by one man. It appears to me now that the wholesale trade in brimstone has declined; the big venders hav, in a measure, gone out. There is as much sulphur in the old mine as ever—it is full of damnation—but the vender is becoming a dapper little cuss; a society lady's man; a dear lover of ease and nice place. He dresses pretty and uses perfumery; he gets off a lot of stuff, "airy nothings," for which dupes pay a big price. This is a blight on the age! Children raised on such stuff are weaklings, and when manhood and womanhood come they are slaves to fear. Oh, how contemptible to a thinking, reasoning man! It is my hope that the character of a peoples' religion does change with the advanced ideas of thinkers and reasoners on science and nature. It appears that man is destined to be cursed with some kind of a delusion; he will stand in awe of mystery, and if reason and intelligence advance we may hope that "man's worship of the unknown" will be cursed with less bigotry and greater freedom. I think Infidels and Freethought people may take courage. One of our greatest fights is, and will be, to preserve the public schools from the bane of the "Bible in the schools." Our hope is strengthened by the fact that the burning jealousy existing between Christian sects will not permit the reading of the "holy scriptures" to children by any teacher not recognized as standard in the orthodoxy of the parents. A Presbyterian would never consent to the Bible being read to his children by a Methodist teacher. An idea might be suggested, even by emphasis, that would not be "the doctrin" of Presbyterianism. This is a wholesome feature for Freethinkers; while the denominations quarrel the Bible is kept out. (Let us pray!) SLO HYCUM.

PALATKA, FLA., Oct. 11, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: When I read Truesdell's tirade in the issue of October 9th, I was amazed that you had printed it, not because he "sat upon you"—for a thousand of his weight could not crush you—but I wondered at your giving it room, solely because of its puerility and utter want of either a material fact or a scintillation of logical acumen. You hav answered it well. In fact, the only way it can be answered as a whole. And you also do well to leave the matter with "the common sense of your readers," and for one I would say that if they do not sit upon Mr. Truesdell in sufficient numbers to make him squeal, you had better wind up the affairs of the Truth Seeker Co. at once, for then it will be abundantly evidenced that its propaganda has been for naught. Unless at least nine-tenths of your subscribers of a year's standing, or more, accept your definition of Freethought (as quoted by Truesdell), and which he asserts as his belief, that "not one Liberal in a hundred can be found who understands it [Freethought] as you do," THE TRUTH SEEKER is neither educational nor influential, and you are wasting you valuable time and talents on a forlorn hope, and I should recommend you to go into politics, or raising potatoes at the old homestead.

This very sentence of yours that Truesdell criticises so severely will some day (after, maybe, you are gone hence) be nailed to the masthead of the old ship (sheet) of which you are now the skipper, as the best formulation of Freethought possible.

It would be a matter of interest, and the knowledge would be valuable, if an expression of every one of you readers could be had on the subject. Cannot some cheap mode be devised whereby it could be obtained? If every Freethinker could hav the opportunity of voting yea or nay upon the proposition that "Freethought stands for [or ought to stand for] absolute freedom of thought, of speech, of publication upon any and every subject on earth," and, at least, three-fourths of the returns were not "yea," I should lose all hope of righteousness ever prevailing on the planet we occupy.

LOUIS MORRIS.

ANDOVER, KAN., Sept. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please excuse delay in my renewal. I hav been waiting patiently on one new subscriber, and inclosed you will find two new ones. I hav taken your paper since March last, and must say that it shall be a welcome visitor in my house. The pictures were a surprise to me somewhat, but after recovering my equilibrium, I came to the same conclusion as my friends here, who say they are only "imaginary." Well, the pictures of Jesus Christ nailed on the cross, healing the sick, and raising the dead, or of the finding of Moses in the bulrushes, the children of Israel in the Red Sea, and a great many more such pictures as are represented by religionists, are only imaginary. The first signs we had of those mythical pictures appeared in the second century. In an argument with a Methodist superintendent as to the divinity of John the Baptist, I contended that he was begotten on the same identical plan that Christ was—that is, the Angel Gabriel being connected with the whole affair. He contended that I was sadly mistaken, and believed that John was begotten by a natural father, and that Christ was begotten by the Archangel; and he knew, as he had made it his constant study, besides sixteen years' service as superintendent. Having an argument with another gentleman, he contended that the time was when people were badly priest-ridden, and were willing to yield to any of their desires, and to dispute one was sin and blasphemy; and some were so credulous that they believed the priests could strike them dead by the power of heaven. I asked him if he did not think we were pretty badly ridden yet by so-called men of God, and he admitted that we were.

I hav been reading about two and a half years both ancient and modern history. The Bible was my first work, and I must say I had not gone a great way till I made up my mind that if there was some infinit being who did pay due regard to all mankind, he certainly never was guilty of such gross misrepresentations. The first account we hav of the human race and date with authority was in Greece, when they recorded their first Olympian games, and that was 776 years before Christ; and these were in honor of their god Apollo. Now, we find in Exodus xxv, the description, continuing to the end of that book, of a being or box manufactured by the Jews, and upon that rests all the acts and tyrannies contained in the old Bible, and I am not sure but the New Testament is based upon that same being. It sounded very much like it when I read it. Besides, I will challenge the Christian gentleman to prove the contrary. Now, comparing the Bible with history, I find that they concur with each other in regard to the numerous gods which every nation had and worshiped.

A. H. WOLF.

LEXINGTON, KY., Sept. 24, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I send a Mosaic (not Moses), though I dread the waste basket. I hav no admiration for a general who had no authority over his soldiers without a "thus saith the Lord" tacked to his commands. Napoleon, Cæsar, and Grant needed no such expressions—gained the love of armies without resorting to such expedients. The necessity of using such arts betrays only the weakness of a military commander. Victory follows only bravery, numbers, and disciplin. The invincible courage of the gladiators who formed the body guard of Cæsar made him successful. Machiavel taught that religion should be recognized by all governments, which was paying the human race a poor compliment. Would Cromwell's influence so soon hav died out had it been founded simply upon the principles of justice and liberty?

Late writers intimate that religion has formed the strongest of all bonds of union. If so, then the credit belongs alone to the philosophical ideas incorporated with it, the golden sentiments of Stoics and Platonists, which constitute the chief beauty of the Christian system. The fanaticism clinging thereto is never relied upon, except by money-making rulers and priests, and when it dies away it leaves the masses where it found them, devoid of solace and improvement. Shall we ever know how much the gentle Shakspere has taught us in his bible, which has occupied hours which might otherwise hav been filled with ignorant pastime and crime—the heavenly Burns which makes so beautiful the path of honor and truth?

Let us not despair of the world, so easily can we expose the arts of priests and Prohibitionists, who are, no doubt, intent upon government founded upon church power. Rest not, friends of liberty, till this serpent is crushed. His breath pollutes the land. While I am now writing a pale-faced man is hovering near the porch. He wants THE TRUTH SEEKER. But a stronger arm reached first and obtained it. I cannot supply the demand for this kind of reading. If I had a few tracts I could obtain access to corner stores and leave them—the laborers carry it along so gingerly when they obtain one. Who shall decry woman, and her works, when they behold the noble stand taken by Mrs. Parsons in favor of mental liberty?

The noble patriots who hav risked their lives for the cause of freedom should be defended, their plans modified without obscuring or blotting out the glorious, burning central thoughts, which yet are to be factors in an improved civilization. If there is a true antidote to monopolism, think twice before you cast it into oblivion. I pity the Catholics as much as I blame them. A priest from the South told me lately that he was in despair, had nothing to liv for, and still he would rather cut his own throat than to leave the true church. Oh, think of it! the Protestants and Catholics hav possession of our children! There are lecturers in plenty for adults, but who is collecting the children to teach them pleasant truths, presenting facts and illustrations? We are blessed with good writers. Our noble and honored John Peck, and our "Si" (Si Slokum), our grand and useful Juliet, our transcendent Watson Heston. But I will weary you no longer.

ALHAZA.

RICHLAND, D. T., Sept. 24, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: An earnest reader of your paper would be pleased for a short space to express a few random thoughts. It is just as natural to hav camp-meetings out here, where the whistling blizzard howls, as in the far East, and in the course of one in an adjoining town a revivalist said to a Christian lady, "Go down among the crowd and beg of them to forsake sin and seek Jesus." The lady replied, "I do not believe in that way of saving sinners." In a moment the divine was down on his knees praying for the Lord to remove her from the way, by death, if not otherwise, and ended up in this wise, "O Lord, remove the dry bones from the path." Shade of immortal Moses! giv us another shower of manna. When will Christian tyranny cease? When will these theological gibcats quit heaping such stupendous insults upon an intelligent people? How long shall brazen hypocrisy and white-robed ignorance be at a premium, while common sense and reason are below par? O ye pharisees, lend me your ears. How much longer will you let these outrageous insults be heaped upon you? Is it not time for action? Is it not time to put forth our best efforts to sink into oblivion the most cruel and barbarous religion that ever cursed mankind? Freethinkers, arise from your dormant state; shake off the dust, for there never was a time in the world's history when your efforts were needed as now.

People harp about the Chicago Anarchists. Tell me what they hav done that was half the crime that was perpetrated upon this good woman? This clergyman prayed for God to do what his own cowardly being would do if he dared. It shows the true inwardness of Christianity and what it would do if it could only gain the power that it once controled—the power that incarnadined the Roman empire with blood, and turned back the hands on the dial of progress and civilization a thousand years; the power that founded the Inquisition; that let the hissing flames devour those who dared voice one noble sentiment; that stoned to death with relentless fury those who entered one protest against their narrow and contracted creeds; the power that is to-day trying to thrust itself into the Constitution of our nation; the power that says, "Wives be in subjection to your husband," or, religiously interpreted, "Do as the preachers bid you," or your path will be decorated with Christian thorns and contempt; the power that says, speaking of women, "But they are commanded to be under obedience" (1 Cor. xiv), which, interpreted by the clergy, means that woman shall be subservient to their wishes.

The same minister, in the course of another hypochondriac spell, said, "No honest man can stay outside of the church." Never, since the big frog-crop in Egypt, when God turned the waters into blood, and caused the dust to evolute into full-grown graybacks, hav intelligent people been so grossly insulted. I assert here that there can be no honest person in the church, if the strict observance of the so-called divine book is adhered to, not in a business sense, but religious sense. They all claim to believe the "inspired volume," when, if asked if they approved of certain things therein (not quoting verse), they would invariably say no. I hav listened to numbers of preachers discourse and don't believe I ever heard a clergyman preach unless he either outlandishly lied or grossly misrepresented. I ask, Are men honest who lie? Are men honest who say, "We don't care how we get converts so we get them." Another minister said, speaking of the conversion of children, "The first call I had to preach was when I was seven years old."

I believe this is the biggest record of soft-sawder I ever heard of. "Lord, giv us horse sense."

And now, before I close, I must say, May laurels crown the heads of Helen H. Gardener, Elmina, and the score of noble-minded women foremost in the Freethought ranks to-day; and I do welcome with delight the sound and witty sayings of John Peck, while Si Slokum makes "Rome howl" and Putnam givs us new courage by his items of travel and general welcome wherever he goes; and, last of all, there is a big white crown in store for Watson Heston, our cartoonist.

And may the grand old TRUTH SEEKER long survive to bring the "glad tidings of great joy," and inspire us on and giv us new hope of the day when reason shall rule, and superstition be dethroned; when the millennium of science will supersede the dark ages of creeds. Then will bigotry and fanaticism be of the past; then will the religion of humanity hav taken the place of relentless creeds and Christian tyranny, and it will be popular to voice the true and noble principles of Freethought; then we can build up a religion based upon justice to all and ill-will to none. Let us strive to hasten the dawn of this new era, is the earnest wish of your friend and co-worker,

LOUIS N. CRILL, Jr.

PETERBOROUGH, N. H., Oct. 18, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 16th the remarks of Robert G. Ingersoll on the candidacy of Henry George for mayor of New York. I hav contended for the past ten years that the American people hav not intelligence enough to maintain a republican government; that is, "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people." From Mr. Ingersoll's remarks I see he is of the same opinion; and why should he not be? Every election from the beginning of the war down to the present time is proof of it. He says, "The government cannot take care of the people." He evidently considers "the government and the people," two distinct factors; and says that "the people must support the government."

Now, there is no man living who knows better than Mr. Ingersoll that an "intelligent people" would not "support the government" that was not able to "take care of the people." I hav been fully alive to the fact for twenty-five years that the government has not been taking care of the dear people. The government has been doing its level best to take care of, and provide for, and build up the giant monopolies.

The dear people hav been left out in the cold, the government having passed into the hands of the great monopolies. The said monopolies, to show that there is nothing small about them, are now taking care of the dear people, and it is a lovely job they are doing too. They are taking care of the people as the vulture takes care of the lamb.

There is but one solitary thing that the government can do and that is to own and control and run the mail service, and in this one instance the "people" are the government. The mail service is "by the people, of the people, and for the people." It can carry letters all over the continent for two cents each. And it once could carry merchandise for eight cents per pound; an investivation showed that merchandise at eight cents a pound paid a much better revenue than books and newspapers. But every one knows that the express companies paid Congress for raising the rate from eight to sixteen cents a pound, and at the last session of Congress they tried to get it up to thirty-two cents a pound; that is one of the nice things of the government that "the people must support." Anthracite coal costs $14 per ton in Nebraska; the miner who digs it gets 50 cents for his share; the mine owners and the railroad companies get $13.50 for their share. Now, if the government owned the mines and the railroads, as it ought to, it could pay the miner 75 cents per ton for digging, and lay down the coal in Nebraska and every other State in the Union for $1.50 per ton. The actual cost of carrying a ton of coal from the mines to Nebraska is 60 cents. But, of course, the government could not own the mines and railroads for the reason that the dear people are not intelligent enough. It almost kills the government to own the mail service.

Another thing the government could not do was to own and control the public domain. It was such a burden on its hands that it gave away to corporate rings enough of it to make nine states as large as the state of Ohio. And so glad was it to be rid of it that it was exempted from taxation. But let an honest toiler buy a piece of that land, and go to improving it, and see how soon the government will pounce on him for taxes! Talk about church property being exempt from taxation! Suppose all the church property in the land had been stolen from the government, what then? Why, of course it would hav been all right, if "our party" had done it, and legalized the theft. That is another feature of the government that the people must support.

There was yet another thing the government could not do. The government could not float two thousand millions of greenbacks. The government could not stand it to see that amount of money circulating among the people, for their benefit. It could not float that amount, and hav it not costing the people a hundred millions yearly interest. But it could and did float more than two thousand millions of bonds, exempted from taxation, and costing the dear people up to the present time more than the original amount in gold interest. That is one of the things the government can do. That was in the interest of the rich robber class. Again talk about church property being exempt from taxation!

Behold "how little can be accomplished by legislation" (for the people). I was laboring under the delusion that all this plundering was accomplished by "legislation." I was under the impression that the greenbacks were taken out of circulation and burnt up, and converted into bonds, by "legislation." I often think of what I heard Mr. Ingersoll say about the greenbacks in a stump speech—in 1868, I think it was—in Galesburg, Ill. He extolled the greenback higher than any Greenbacker I hav ever heard since that time. Some of his remarks made such an impression on my mind at that time that I hav remembered them very distinctly.

Among other things, he said: "Instead of a man going to the Rocky mountains to dig gold and silver, let that man build a wagon; and let the government issue the greenbacks to pay for that wagon." "As for the redemption of the greenback, it is redeemed every time one man takes it from another; and that is all the redemption it needs." He held up to ridicule the idea of specie redemption of paper money. He said: "You farmers remember when you used to haul your wheat from here to Chicago, and sell it for fifty cents a bushel; you went with ox teams, camping out on the road, cooking your bacon in an old skillet tipped up on one corner to keep the grease from running out of a hole in the bottom. That was your good old specie basis times!" The applause was deafening. That was the way the leaders of the Republican party talked about the greenback at that time. It was the stock in trade and the pride of the party. That was just about the way John Sherman talked on the Senate floor at that time. He said that "any man who would refuse to take the greenback for his bond was not only a repudiator, but a traitor to his country!" But not long after that the bankers and bond-holders taught him how to lay up $100,000 a year out of a salary of $8.000 a year, and the scales fell from his eyes, and things hav not looked just the same since, especially the greenbacks, for he has worked with all his might and main to get the last one destroyed.

And these, and a long chapter of the same sort, are the glorious workings of the "government" that "the people must support."

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Small Boy's Happy Thought.

We were working in the garden,
My little boy and I,
Both digging weeds,
And planting seeds
To blossom by and by.

"Here is some pop-corn, dear," I said,
"I'll giv you for your own;
To plant and hoe,
And watch it grow,
And hav it when it's grown."

He took the kernel eagerly,
His little hoe he dropped,
Then, out he burst—
"Let's pop it first,
So it will come up popped!"

—Bessie Chandler, in St. Nicholas for October.

My Friends Asleep.

My friends one thing in common hav,
As great as is their number;
Timid, ferocious, and brave,
All hav their hours for slumber.

Minerva's emblem old is one,*
Who asks no odds of sunshine;
Night knows his hollow, shifting tone,
And day his restful confine.

North Europe's coast on spring's light nights
Has its half saints, half clowns,
Storks, ghost-like, clear-cut 'gainst the hights,
Stand scattered o'er its towns.

These, true, are "right side up with care,"
Some friends don't sleep quite so;
Some four-foot night-birds,† too, there are,
Sleep heels up, heads hung low.

Some spread them flat upon the earth;
Some roll up in a ball;
Some sleep in rocking liquid girth,
And fear no harm from fall.

Some stand on one leg while they sleep,
And some stand up on four;
Some in between two blankets creep,
And then proceed to snore.

Children and Fire.

The magazine Boyhood has something to say about emergencies, and fitting children to meet them. We quote: "Children should be impressed with the fact that fire cannot burn without air; that it blazes more brightly in the wind, while it will grow dull if the air is kept away; they can be shown how a burning cloth or paper can be extinguished by being crushed in an old piece of carpet or rag (since it is by illustration rather than by simple telling that such facts can best be impressed on their minds), and stories can be told them of persons who hav saved their clothing from burning by such means. Especially should they be charged not to run in case of their clothing catching fire, nor even to stand up, since ascending flames may burn face and eyes; but rather to lie down and cry for help, in the mean time extinguishing the flames in the way above described, if possible."

Words of Wisdom.

Victory belongs to the most persevering.

Everyone can master a grief but he that hath it.

Who seeks a friend without a fault remains without one.

Fire and sword are but slow engins of destruction in comparison to the babbler.

Let a man be never so ungrateful, or inhuman, he shall never destroy the satisfaction of having done a good office.

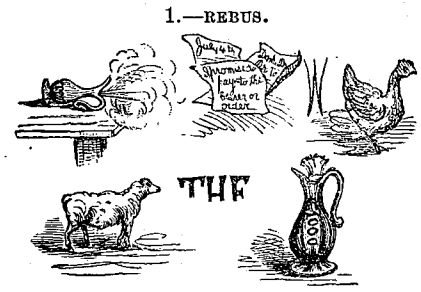
It is only by labor that thought can be made healthy; and it is only by thought that labor can be made happy.

Every heart has its secret sorrow which the world knows not, and oftentimes we call a man cold when he is only sad.

People may make injuries worse by unreasonable conduct, by giving way to anger and satisfying that for the moment, instead of thinking what will be the effect in the future.

It is selfish to dwell on our griefs, as though some strange thing had happened to us, as though they were too important to be relieved or it were a virtue to sink under them. That bereavement seems rather sanctified which saddens the heart not over much, and softens without withering it.

Correspondence.



SPRINGFIELD, ILL., Oct. 12, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav heard of THE TRUTH SEEKER before, and thought I would like to drop you a few lines. I am ten years old. I go to the Edwards' school, and I am in the "Fourth Reader," and fifth room. Miss Whipple is my teacher's name. I started to take music lessons this vacation from Mrs. Cellar, and I like it very much. I sometimes help mamma with the work at home, but I would rather be excused, for I do enjoy visiting my schoolmates. I always hav a very pleasant time. I will now draw to a close, for this is my first letter I hav written.

I remain yours truly, EMMA C. HOEHN.

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—REBUS.

Good advice.

2.—DOUBLE CHARADE.

I.

Between a rich, elegant outer dress,
And a hot, spicy root, interpose
Two letters that Arthur's pet name will express;
With the fifth of the scale diatonic then close.

Or, II.,

First, one who puts a dress on;
Next, one who paints it light;
And last, to help your guess on,
The sun so clear and bright.

ENLARGEMENT.

The last has given me some trouble—
It ends with letters that are double;
And then, the vowel that precedes it—
I know not how our whole just reads it.
But puzzlers hav a way—you know it—
A greater license than a poet—
Of dropping doubles, lapping singles—
(As carpenters would do with shingles).
They read by sound, if that suits better;
Or otherwise they read by letter.
As for the vowel—would you think it?
They either lengthen it or shrink it.
With all this latitude in version,
Bible translators make a worse one.
Since inspiration does not guide me,
And strict precision has not tied me,
Just let me say that last would answer
To designate God's wisest man, sir;
Rather contemptuous, but this creature
To me is vile in every feature.
If then no man than he was greater
I'm glad that I liv somewhat later,
When greatness does not find its measure
In having many wives, much treasure.
Were he the last man on this planet,
And I the only woman on it,
I'd giv my last to Satan, rather Than hav my child call such man, father.
I'd walk through fire, my last's a-blister,
Rather than be his wife, child, sister.
Enough, enough! our whole advances!
His bearing all my last entrances!
"Faith" drops her wings upon a bustard—
Her "kingdom," "like the seed of mustard,"
Is seen to be but mustard plaster,
To draw our cash for Lord and master;
He speaks and with a direful clatter
The ghostly hosts begin to scatter!
His every word, as Music's laughter
Seems echoed from the starry rafter!
The God that threw and maimed poor Jacob
Now gets a serious fall and shake up;
The God, discomfited, leaves halting,
And priests, saints, all, go somersaulting;
While Liberty, with eyes that glisten,
Leaps forth to bless him from her prison.

THE RISE OF

INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY

From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR

Parallels in Other Religions

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of heathen nations of Antiquity, Considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous illustrations.

The object of the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It is unquestionable true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made in the work before us."—N. Y. Sun.

WHAT'S TO BE DONE?

A NIHILISTIC ROMANCE.

By N. G. TCHERNYCHEWSKY. With a portrait of the Author. Translated by BENJ. R. TUCKER.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

Ansonia, Conn., Secular Union.

Among the best evidence that the convention of the New York Freethinkers' Association at White Sulphur Springs was not confined in its good results to the grand social time enjoyed by all who attended, is the fact that Mr. G. G. Grower, of Ansonia, Conn., inspired by the spirit of the convention, on returning home went diligently to work and rallied all the Liberally disposed in his neighborhood, urging on them the necessity of united action, and the advantages of organization and the establishment of a science school on Sundays.

By indefatigable effort he inspired a spirit of emulation that resulted in a very liberal subscription, and he wrote me for dates to go there, lecture, and organize. And the result exceeded the expectations of the most sanguin. The room of the G. A. R. in the opera house building was engaged, and on Sunday, October 17th, at 3 P.M., the room was four-fifths filled, the larger proportion being Christians. I spoke on "Secularism, and the Nine Demands of Liberalism," and hav every reason to believe that much of prejudice was removed. All appeared deeply interested, as was evinced by the large number who came to the rostrum to receive sample copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I sold a number of books, and some twenty copies of "Blasphemy and the Bible."

In the evening at 8 P.M. the hall was crowded. I spoke on "The Bible: Whence It Came and What It Really Teaches," and was most attentivly listened to. After the lecture, I asked that those who favored the formation of a Secular Society would remain. I then laid before them the necessity of organization and the aims and objects of the American Secular Union, and explained how science schools could be successfully carried on without a professional teacher, and then proceeded to organization, with the following very gratifying results:

OFFICERS ELECTED.

President, W. J. Wilder.
Vice-president, Mrs. J. Grower.
Secretary, Geo. G. Grower.
Treasurer, W. H. Morris.
Vigilance Committee, Henry Kalterssen, Nicholas Port, Henry Sands.
Educational Committee, R. Locke, Miss Annie Rennenberg, George G. Grower.
Social Committee, Mrs. W. J. Wilder, Miss Annie Rennenberg, Mr. H. Kalterssen.
There are eighteen adult members.

I was most hospitally entertained by Mr. G. G. Grower and his parents. They hav a most delightful, happy home, and awarded me a right royal welcome. I was very glad to know the parents of our studious and energetic Professor Grower. It does much to reconcile one to the arduous work, and inspires to redoubled effort to know such good folks are deeply interested in our success.

Mr. G. G. Grower has shown what an earnest effort can accomplish under most unfavorable auspices. If we desire success we must make effort. Who will follow the good example? Let none mourn they are lonely, no Secular society in their neighborhood, no place for them or their children to attend on Sunday, until they hav made earnest effort, circulated Liberal leaflets, canvassed their neighborhood for subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal papers. Let all who possibly can attend the Congress of the American Secular Union, to be held at Chickering Hall, New York, Nov. 11th, 12th, and 13th. In the language of our good Secretary Putnam, "We want to find the best way. We want to understand each other. We want to help all round. We want to push things, to arouse, agitate, discuss, reform. We want every Liberal that can to attend this New York Congress." And let all the genuin Liberals say Amen!

C. B. REYNOLDS.

Obituary.

DIED.—At Plympton, Mass., October 18th, Z. M. Washburn, aged 67 years.

John W. Dodd, of Jersey City, N. J., died October 9th, aged 67. Born of Presbyterian parents, in early manhood he became a truth seeker. Kind and gentle of disposition, he had no sympathy with sectarian intolerance, or the hate it engenders. Fearless in his nature, the terrors of hell failed to force him to reverence or obedience to the church. He questioned, investigated, exercised his reason, and the rantings of the ministers and elders about hell-fire and the dreadful vengeance of God, that loving heavenly father who, in his own holy word, declares himself filled with hate, rage, jealousy, and vengeance, only excited his pity for the credulity of those who believed, and indignation at those who proclaimed, such absurdities.

Mr. Dodd raised a family of truth seekers, who honored him, not "that their days might be long in the land," but because his life challenged their admiration. He was a great admirer of the lamented D. M. Bennett; a constant subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and took great pleasure in reading it to his wife and children. Temperate in all his habits, honest and truthful by nature, he loved justice and found delight in promoting the happiness of all around him. He died as calm and peaceful as a tired child falling to sleep surrounded by his loved ones.

His brave, honored life-companion, nor his children, had need of any speaking words of comfort. They were bereaved—but their consolation was the remembrance of his life of love.

At the grave we bade him farewell with these words:

"Thus we consign our brother to his last resting-place and bid him a fond farewell. Dear friends, do not let us lament the inevitable. We are all in the arms of nature; the universe has made ample provision for all wants and conditions of humanity, alike in life and in death.

"Powers depart,
Possessions vanish, and opinions change,
And passions hold a fluctuating seat;
Yet by the storm of circumstances shaken,
But, subject neither to eclipse nor wane,
Duty exists, immutably remains.

"Let all that was noble and worthy in the life of our brother liv, fondly cherished in our heart of hearts. Let his virtues be held in sacred remembrance, as an impetus, an inspiration, to us, who are left behind, so soon to follow after. And so we bid our brother, Good-bye! good-night!" C. B. R.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

OF PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY
BY LEWIS G. JANES.

This book treats of the natural evolution of the Christian religion, its historical antecedents in Palestinian Judaism and Roman Paganism; investigates the history of the founder of Christianity in the light of the latest scientific criticism of the New Testament; shows that the true story of the Man Jesus, and his genuin teachings are separable from the later legendary accretions which hav confounded him with the mythical Christ, and traces the natural development of Christian dogma and ecclesiastical institutions. Complete references and full index. 320pp. 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price $1.50.

HENRY GEORGE, candidate for mayor of New York, invited his Democratic opponent, Abram Hewitt, to debate the questions at issue between them from the public platform. Mr. Hewitt declined, but replied through the press. Mr. George rejoined in the same manner, and each has now written three letters. The disputants are conceded to be evenly matched, though Mr. George has a slight advantage in being supported by a party that has no record.

LUCY PARSONS, the Anarchist's wife, had a hall hired at Orange, N. J., where she was advertised to speak last Sunday. When she arrived in town she found the hall locked, and a man standing guard before it armed with a musket and bayonet. The owner had decided not to let her use the room. Having paid the rent in advance, Mrs. Parsons pushed the guard aside, kicked in the door, entered the hall, and, putting her head out of a window, invited the crowd to enter and hear the speaking. The marshal attempted to clear the hall, but Mrs. Parsons confronted him with a contract for the hall showing that it belonged to her for that day, and he backed out. The lecturer thereupon proceeded with her remarks. There was no disturbance nor occasion for one.

Odds and Ends.

A CLERGYMAN was telling a marvelous story, when his little girl said, "Now, pa, is that true, or is it only preaching?"

A FEMALE of an uncertain age was asked by a census taker, "How old are you, madam?" "Thirty years," she replied. "That's what you told me last census, ten years ago." "Well, I'm not one of the kind of women who tell one story one time and another story another."

IN a country printing-office. Editor (to compositor): "How do you spell pneumonia?" Compositor (after several attempts): "Giv it up. Why don't you look in the dictionary?" Editor: "Because I am sitting on it, and don't want to disturb myself. Never mind; I'll say the old gentleman died of some disease that is easier to spell."

IN a household in which the "Mikado" is a favorit composition, a little girl came downstairs the other day and asked her aunt what dreadful things she supposed her still younger sister put in her prayers? The aunt expressed her inability to conjecture, and the shocked little maiden replied, "She says, 'O Lord! bless the flowers that bloom in the spring, tra la.'"

MR. WAYBACK: "Yes, beats all what queer things happen nowadays. We've got the durndest mystery you ever see in our town now." Omaha man: "Ah! some crime, I suppose?" "Well, yes, something like that. You see, a tramp has confessed that he stole $10 from the contribution-box of our church." "Yes, but where's the mystery? You know who took it." "Why, we can't imagin how it got there, you see."

A SCRIPTURAL Panorama.—The regular lecturer to the panorama being ill, his assistant behind the scenes, a Hibernian, officiated in the capacity one night. Lecturer: "This movin' scane, gintlemen and ladies, represints 'Daniel in the Lions' Den.' This is Daniel betwixt the lions." Auditor: "Be them wild lions or circus lions!" Lecturer: "I pity the ignorance of the like of yez, sor. This was B.C., before circuses."—Texas Siftings.

TOURIST: "An' now me letter of credit is cashed, can you direct me to some spot in this blawsted country that will equal Pipe-weed-under-Taycopse-Herfordshire-heath, North Staffordshire, England, for a flip at a salmon?" Banker: "I seldom fish myself, but I understand that Mud Creek-over-against-Bill-Simmonse's-Mill-pond-Knox-county, over-the-left-and-under-suspicion-Maine, United States of America, four-hands-round, is a fair sporting ground."

THE modern rage for abbreviations, especially in the names of societies (says the Freeman) was strikingly exemplified the other day at a certain woman's prayer-meeting. One of the sisters, who is very much interested in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, the Woman's Home Missionary Society, and the Woman's Educational and Industrial Union, prayed fervently, with a charming certainty that she would be understood, "O Lord, bless the W. C. T. U., the W. F. M. S., the W. H. M. S., and the W. E. and I. U.!" s of man, intellectually, Jeffrey considers as the worldling does, to be happy. I hav heard him say, "If folly were the happiest, I would be a fool!" Yet his daily life belies this doctrin, and says, "Though goodness were the most wretched, I would be good."—Carlyle's Letters.

"I DID but prompt the age to quit their clogs." Milton embodied, more perfectly than any of his contemporaries, this spirit of the age. It is the ardent aspiration after the pure and noble life, the aspiration which stamps every line he wrote, verse or prose, with a dignity as of an heroic age. This givs consistency to all his utterances. . . . Milton defended religious liberty against the prelates, civil liberty against the crown, the liberty of the press against the Presbyterians, and domestic liberty against the tyranny of canon law. Milton's pamphlets might hav been stamped with the motto which Selden inscribed (in Greek) in all his works, "Liberty before everything."—Pattison's Milton.

AN author of strong common-sense observed that "a miracle is no miracle at second hand;" he might hav added that a miracle is no miracle in any case, for until we are acquainted with all natural causes, we hav no reason to imagin others.—Shelley's Notes to Queen Mab.

"I SHOULD not believe such a story, were it told me by Cato," was a proverbial saying in Rome, even during the life-time of that philosophical patriot. The incredibility of a fact, it was allowed, might invalidate so great an authority.—Hume's Essay on Miracles.

O THOU that after toil and storm
Mayest seem to hav reached a purer air,
Where faith has center everywhere,
Nor carest to fix itself to form,
Leave thou thy sister, when she prays,
Her early heaven, her happy views;
Nor then with shadowed hint confuse
A life that leads melodious days.
—Tennyson's In Memoriam.

NOTE.—These lines were recalled to my memory by an extract from Huxley's "Emancipation," and I hav transcribed them that my readers may meditate and make up their minds upon the validity of their import. For myself, I do not hesitate to avow that they seem to me to be uttered in the spirit of pure cant, a failing that the poet laureate of England is not, I am sorry to say, altogether free from. "What is sauce for the goose,' we hav it on good authority, "is sauce for the gander;" and if you hav, "after trial and storm," eradicated errors and falsities from your own mind, and hav found that it does you good, it is natural and proper that you carry relief from the yoke of superstition to your mother, your sister, or your wife. No consistent Freethinker would—it goes without saying—seek to force an opinion upon any one, but he, too, should let his light shine before men, and especially before those of his own household. The subject is too large to be entered on in a note, but I cannot let Tennyson's lines—beautiful and tender as they are—pass through my hands without protesting against their truth, and saying plainly that I look on them as mean and cowardly. I don't ask any Infidel brother—God forbid—to annoy his mother, or his sister, or his wife on account of their sticking to creeds that hav lost credit with him; but I do exhort him to hold up his head and bear testimony, as mildly as may be, but at the same time as firmly as need be, against all hypocrisy and lies.—Hylax.

WHILE I LIV BE TRUE.

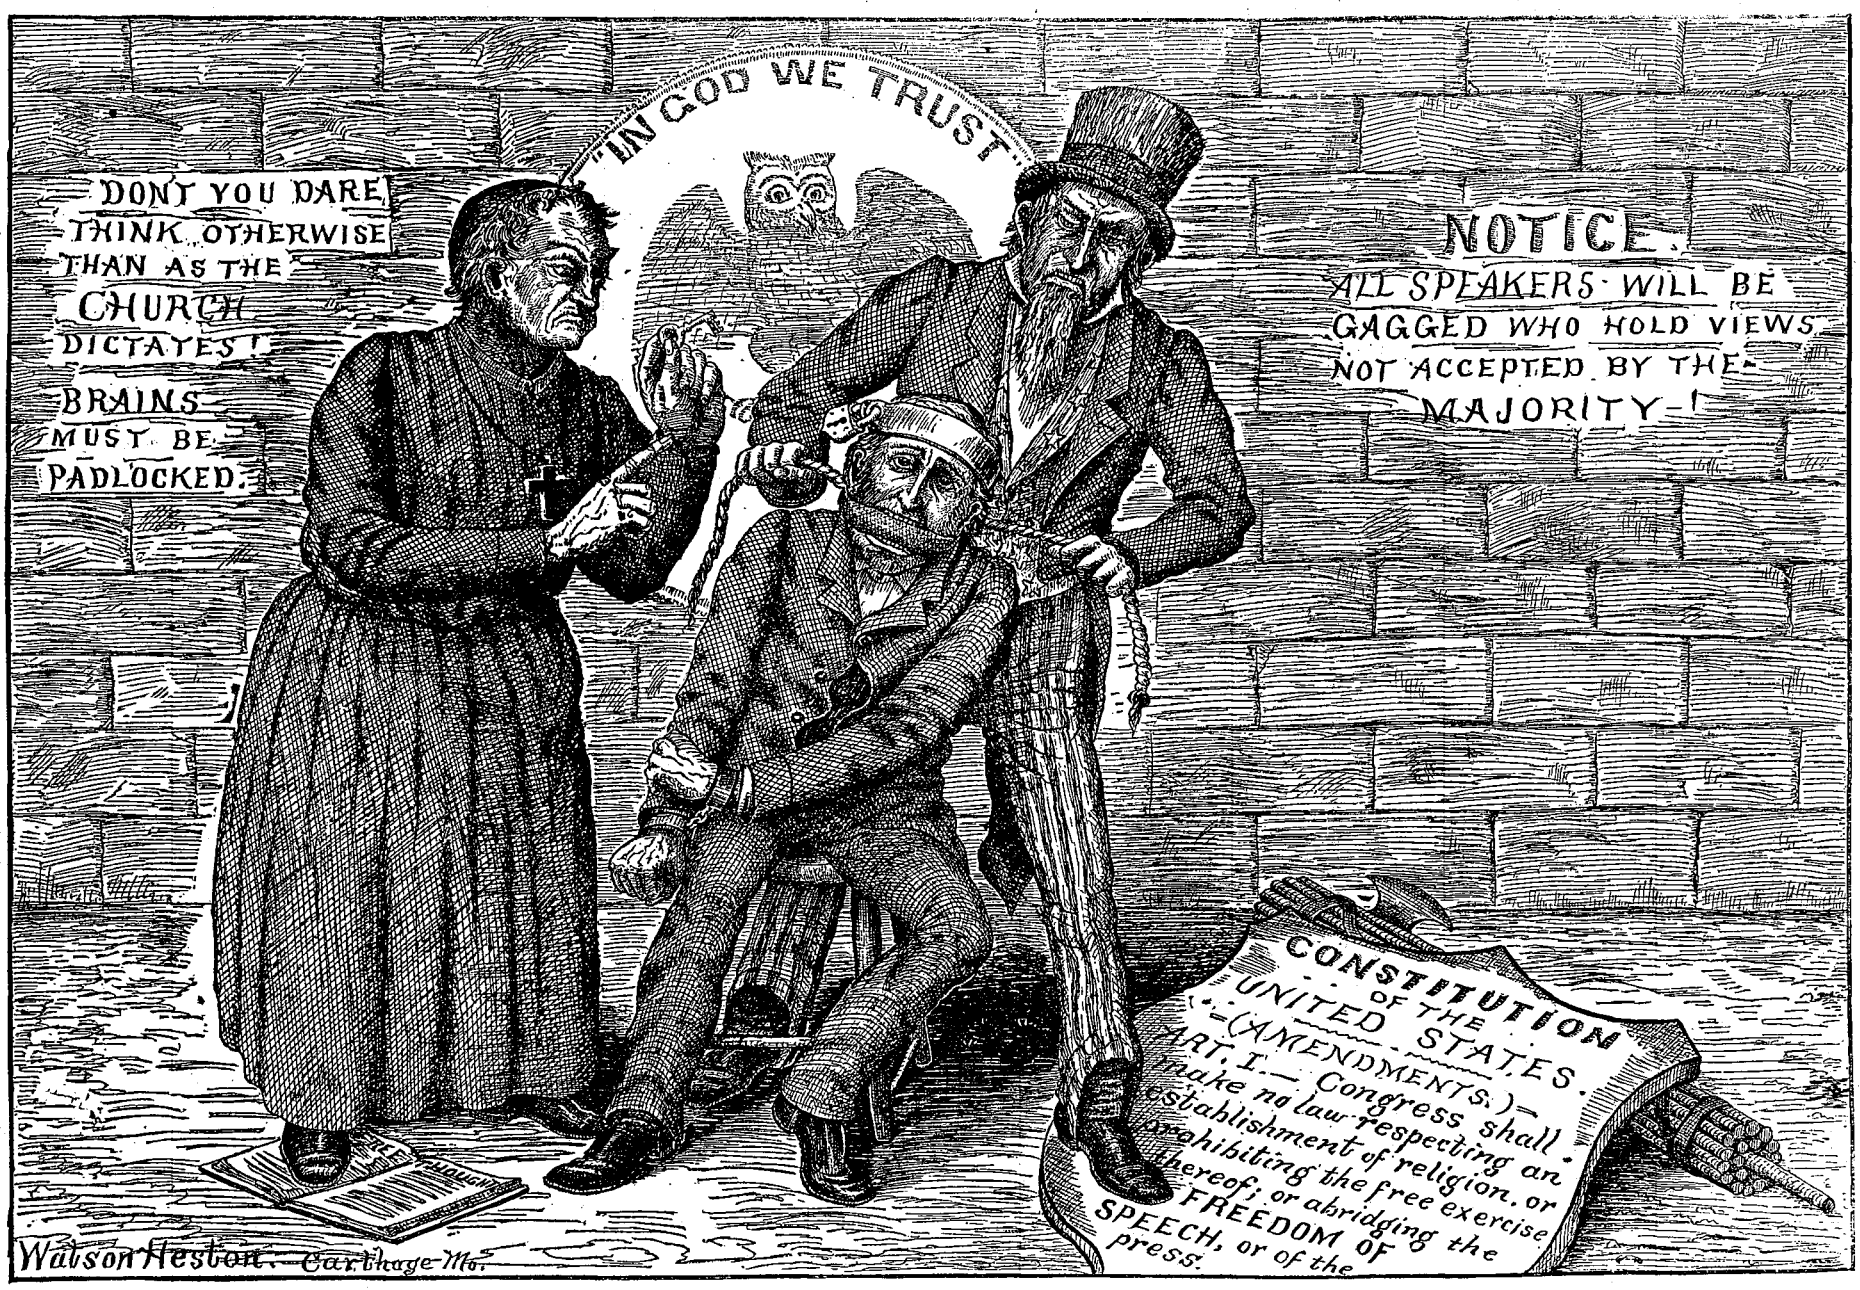
Make me no vows of constancy, my friend,
To love me, though I die, thy whole life long,
And love no other till thy days shall end—
Nay, it were rash and wrong.

If thou canst love another, be it so;
I would not reach out of my quiet grave
To bind thy heart if it should choose to go—
Love should not be a slave.

Thou wouldst not feel my shadowy caress,
If, after dark, my soul should linger here;
Men's hearts crave tangible, close tenderness,
Love's presence, warm and near.

It would not make me sleep more peacefully
That thou wert wasting all thy life in woe
For my poor sake; what love thou hast for me,
Bestow it ere I go.

Carve not upon a stone when I am dead
The praises which remorseful mourners giv
To woman's graves—a tardy recompense—
But speak them while I liv.



Forget me when I die! The violets
Above my rest will blossom just as blue,
Nor miss thy tears; e'en Nature's self forgets;
But while I liv be true! —Anon.

THE BIGOTRY OF CHURCH AND STATE.

Notes and Clippings.

MISS ROSE ELIZABETH CLEVELAND, the president's sister, is reported to hav resigned the editorship of the Chicago Literary Life. Her health was poor, and her editorial work was not much better.

THE will of the late Samuel J. Tilden, who left large sums for charitable purposes, is to be contested by his relativs. Mr. Tilden made the mistake of not becoming his own executor while alive.

THE trouble with these "faith cures," says the Norristown Herald, is that in a few weeks after the "complete recovery" is reported, the patient's funeral takes place. This is calculated to make the faith cure unpopular in some quarters.

A BRIGHT boy in Springfield, Mass., asked his school-teacher how far a procession of the presidents of the United States would reach if they were placed in a row. When she gave it up he answered, "From Washington to Cleveland."

AMONG the mottoes displayed in the Henry George parade last Saturday night was this: "Reorganization of Society independent of Boss, Priest, or Loafer." We would recommend that sentiment to the attention of Mr. Powderly, G. M. W., K. of L.

LITERARY men hav been somewhat prominent in New York politics, among them Henry George, Allen Thorndyke Rice, Amos Cummings, and others. The politicians are inclined to make fun of the book-men, though it is believed that the latter shine as brilliantly in politics as the politicians would in literature.

LAST Sunday the Rev. J. Vandyke, Jr., preached a sermon on "Property and Theft from the Christian Viewpoint." Whatever the Christian theory of property and theft may be, the Christian practice is to own the property and commit the theft by dodging taxes.

A MAN in Seattle, W. T., keeps this card standing in a local paper: "Whereas, I hav left my wife and her board; whereas, I hav become attached to another and more attractiv woman, I hereby giv warning to the public that I will in future pay my own bills without any assistance from her whatever."

IN a recent address in London Dr. Farrar said that for every Christian that had been made in India there were one hundred drunkards. In Burmah, Japan, and Madagascar the population was being decimated by British rum. At Nazareth, at this moment, when a drunken man was seen the Mohammedans, pointing the finger of scorn at him, say: "There goes a Christian."

THE Pall Mall Gazette says that Miss Fanny Vaudrey, a lady of independent means, was summoned to the Manchester police court the other day for violent and indecent conduct in the church of St. John the Evangelist, Cheetham. It was stated that on Sunday morning the defendant made a great noise with her umbrella, and from time to time during the service she rapped the front of the pew very loudly with her book. She also coughed in a peculiar manner. When the curate was beginning to read the first lesson, she, looking toward the clergyman, deliberately put her thumb to her nose. The judge dismissed the case, but told the defendant she would surely be fined if she did so again.

A BOSTON clergyman, deeply interested in getting money for a charitable institution, has offered a newspaper man $500 if he will be married on the stage at a coming entertainment in aid of the institution. The newspaper man said that he'd do it. What the young woman said has not been made public, and why the minister doesn't giv the $500 to the charitable institution outright is also an unanswered question.—N. Y. Sun.

THE New York Woman Suffrage Association chartered a boat, and went in a body to visit our new Goddess of Liberty on Bedloe's Island. The fact that Liberty was embodied as a woman they regarded as a compliment to the sex, and so expressed themselvs. Marguerite Moore and several other ladies made excellent speeches. Mrs. Lillie Devereux Blake considered "delightfully inconsistent a statue of Liberty embodied as a woman in a land where no woman has political liberty."

THERE is being exhibited at Leipzic, says the Electrician, an apparatus for putting criminals to death by electricity. So long as it is found necessary to retain capital punishment on our statute books it may well be that the electric method is the most merciful and least repulsiv process that could be devised for carrying the sentence into effect. But if such means are ever adopted in this country the details will certainly not be carried out in the theatrical manner which commends itself to the Leipzic amateur. In this apparatus, behind the chair in which the condemned man is to take his seat—and by means of which, as we need not yet explain in detail, his body is placed in circuit with a powerful coil—there stands a conventional figure of Justice with bandaged eyes, holding the balance in her left hand and the sword in her right. The criminal having taken his seat, the proper functionary is supposed to read over the record of his crimes and the sentence of the law. This ceremony completed, he folds up the document and places it in the scale pan, the arm of the balance descends, closes the circuit, and all is over.

IT sounds like an echo of the voices of the past to hear talk of trying men up at Andover because they are suspected of not believing that all the heathen who hav died without accepting the Christian religion are now roasting in eternal hell. Does it not suggest the times of witch-killing, of the stake and the scourge for unbelievers? Most people who read of the latest New England controversy will smile half incredulously, and wonder if there is anybody left in this century to entertain, in seriousness, such a horrible and blasphemous hypothesis. It is a shocking idea that there are still minds so plunged in mediæval darkness. Unfortunately, the revelations from Andover leave no doubt that such there are. Once in every five years, we learn from Andover reports, the members of the faculty of that astounding institution hav to make affirmation that they still absolutely and wholly believe in certain doctrins prescribed in a past century. Think of it! Think of a man solemnly swearing that in five years of life his mind had not broadened, his thoughts had not grown deeper, his ideas had not become wiser, truer, more wholesome and more charitable and hopeful—that in five years he had learned nothing! And think of making such a man a teacher of youth!—Puck.

The Church and its Influence.

Magellan's voyage around the world wrapped the winding-sheet around the doctrin of a flat earth, and laid it away with other dried mummies. With the flat earth went the infallibility of the church. Geology choked the life out of the Mosaic account of creation and left it of no more account than a dried snake-skin. Martin Luther asserted his right to interpret the scripture for himself; in other words, the right to mental freedom. This has been construed into a license for people to use their brains. When people began to think they ceased to be slaves of the church. Science to-day pays no more attention to the church than it does to a rattle-box.

As the worth of human life has been more appreciated, and the individual became of greater consequence, the church has become more insignificant. As the people have asserted their rights the church has lost prestige and power. As the people hav discarded religious literature and wandered away into the by and forbidden paths of science and secular reading, they hav lost confidence in the Bible and divine interposition. The more general intelligence has been diffused, the less reverence the people hav shown for the clergy. The more the philosophy of human events has been studied, the more the people hav lost confidence in prophecy. The more the real wants of man are studied, the less the demands of the church are heeded. As the church loses control over the minds of men there is a corresponding independence and freedom of thought. The condition of man has been bettered as he has arisen above religious superstition.

Professor Draper says, "As the leaden pressure of the church ceased, the intellect of man expanded." During long centuries the motto of the church has been, "Obedience to the church—loyalty to the king."

It was only when the power of the church began to wane that the grand truth was promulgated that man was born with an inherent right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

The tendency of individualism is to wipe out the power of the church, and the tendency of the church is to wipe out individualism. Before the freedom of thought, and speech, and press can be fully asserted, the power of the church must be beaten back.

The great crime of Martin Luther was that he refused to think as the church dictated. "On this ground I stand," said he, "the church has no more power to bind my mind than my limbs;" and he declared a grand truth. But he failed in not seeing and declaring it to be a universal truth.

Freethought ought ever to be encouraged. It is for the world's best good that it should be. One free man is worth more to the world than a hundred slaves. Instead of proscription and persecution, let the church enter the arena of fair and honest argument. Every claim will be allowed her which is based on reason. Nothing should be allowed which has no other foundation than myth, miracle, and superstition. If Luther had the right to think for himself, that right is common to us all.

The church is aware that every demonstration of science has a tendency to weaken its power. Only a short time ago a religious paper cautioned its readers against "science which does not harmonize with the scriptures." Ultimately the church will find out that the supernatural must giv place to the natural.

Almost invariably the church denies the conclusions of science in regard to the discovery of every new fact. After the fact has been established, the pious experts tinker at it to make it harmonize with the scriptures. Failing in this, they find a new meaning for the scripture which will fit the fact, and after a decade or two will claim the honor of the discovery. The church fought for a flat earth until demonstrated facts made the idea too ridiculous to be tolerated. Now she is constantly boasting how the Copernican theory shows forth the wisdom and power of God. It fought the printing-press, which now is the chief instrument in sending Bibles and tracts and other Christian buncombe to the heathen. It fought the temperance and antislavery reforms, but now it claims all the glory which has been achieved.

It began to dawn upon a few minds that intelligence without Christianity was better than ignorance and poverty with it. Against this doctrin the church leveled its heaviest artillery. The church understood full well that so long as the people could be kept in ignorance they could be induced to starve themselvs in order to keep church dignitaries fat. It was only when the people began to doubt that plagues and pestilences were visitations from God that better conditions were sought for. Nearly every effort to ward off disease was opposed by the church three hundred years ago. Every calamity was regarded by the church as a visitation from God on account of the sins of the people. Every blessing was calculated to make the people vain and draw their minds from heavenly things. In short, whatever looked like improvement and advancement sent up a howl from the church.

Notwithstanding the fact that the church has waged war with science a hundred times, and as many times has been driven to the wall, she now has the brazen effrontery to stand up before the world and declare that she has always been the "true" friend of science. That is, science construed so as to support the Mosaic account of creation, all the miracles and holy absurdities of the church.

The church has always shown a disposition to sacrifice man's best interests on the earth for the interests in an imaginary heaven. Science has had less to do with the heavenly abode, but has vastly improved the condition of man here.

When the church was in full power the average length of human life was twenty-one and twenty-one one-hundredths years. Now it is forty and sixty-eight one-hundredths years. As many liv to the age of seventy now as lived to the age of forty then. This should always remind us that "ignorance is the mother of devotion," and that "knowledge is power."

A storm is gathering. A terrible battle is yet to be joined between science and freedom on the one hand, and the superstitions of the churches on the other. Let no one be surprised to see Protestantism and Catholicism united and marshaling their forces against the advancing hosts of science, whom they know, if not silenced, will ultimately undermine the already worm-eaten altars of superstition.

The wail of the church in both England and America shows that the old superstition is dying out. Science builds on the rocks of the ages, and her deductions will ultimately tear the pretentious robes from the church, and show her to be a demon of darkness instead of an angel of light. This result the church sees if science and the spirit of investigation are left with an open field. As a last resort there will be a union of all denominations professing Christ as the savior of the world, and then, by main force, there will be an effort to choke the life-breath out of science.

Wilford Hall is even now preparing the way by standing science on its head, so to speak, and the churches are quite generally adopting his new theories. He flatly admits that there is an antagonism between theological ideas and the sciences as now taught, and that they never can be harmonized. Hence he has taken the sciences into his mental dissecting-room, and proposes to cut to pieces, rearrange, and breathe a new breath of life into their nostrils, and turn them out either fish, flesh, spirit, or smoke, as may best meet the demands of the church. And the church says, "Yaw, Amen!"

Either science must yield to the dogmatic claims of the church, or the church must relinquish its claim to the inspiration of an "old book." It will be all the worse for the world if the church is victorious.

Select the wisest men from all the nations of the earth, and it would be impossible for them to write out a moral or political code fitly applicable to the wants of the people two thousand years hence. To bind the race to such a code would be to declare that man should never be allowed to progress beyond his present limits. But the Christian puts an old book, the product of an ignorant age, above the accumulated knowledge of the ages, and his whole influence is exerted to make men satisfied with the ignorance of three thousand years ago.

The Christian, after the teachings of the church for eighteen hundred years, asks you to disregard all the teachings of science, and believe that the world, and all the systems of worlds, were made in six days out of nothing; that snakes and jackasses could once talk; that solid walls of masonry could be blown down with rams' horns, and a hundred other ridiculous statements not in keeping with science, and which hav served no other purpose than to dwarf and enslave the minds of men.

When a young man is started out in life with a full belief that such statements are the "finger-marks of God," he is started out a lunatic, and his whole life will probably be spent in fighting the scientific friends of humanity.

When the obscenity, absurdity, and brutality of the Old Testament are shown up to the Christian, he turns to the New Testament, forgetting that a troop of dead men climbing up out of their graves, and galloping round among the saints and apostles, is just as ridiculous as anything described in any book new or old, "Baron Munchausen" not excepted.

Everything recorded in the New Testament would be easy if we could only get back to New Testament times, and then trace the history of events through three or four centuries. Anyone can perform miracles, if a little shrewd, if he can only find people sufficiently ignorant.

Spooks, ghosts, witches, and miracles are at a discount among intelligent men to-day. In parts of Delaware, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania there are still witches, and ghosts, and goblins stalking around. The people are very pious in parts of those states.

There hav been a few men in each century who did not believe in the divinity of Christ, nor in any of the Christian delusions; but when the death penalty was attached for not destroying their writings "wherever found," it will readily be understood why the Christian boasts that his religion has stood the "test of ages," and why the writings of many of those men hav not come down to us. When any system, social, political, or religious, compromises the dignity and freedom of the human mind, shuns the light, or strives to avoid investigation, that system is to be suspected. Every system founded in justice, truth, and reason invites the severest criticism.

I hav entered into the discussion of this subject, not so much because I had confidence in my ability to do the subject justice, as because I considered it one of the most stupendous frauds ever imposed upon an unsuspecting people.

Though my strength may not be that of Hercules, and although others hav wielded weapons far more effectiv than mine, still the temptation is constantly before me to do what I can to put an end to the Christian delusion. JOHN PECK.

Freethought in England.

III.—ORGANS OF FREETHOUGHT—THEIR POLICY.

A few lines about the writers before referring to the policy of the paper. In my last article I omitted the names of two veteran advocates of intellectual freedom—I mean George Jacob Holyoake and Mr. Thomas Slater—but except for very occasional lectures these gentlemen hav both retired from activ service in the Freethought vinyard. The oldest organ of the Freethought party in England is, as your readers are probably aware, the National Reformer, edited by Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs Besant. It may be described as a journal for the discussion of politics, scientific theories, and religion. Besides the editors it has only a few contributors. A learned gentleman of Jewish birth, a ripe scholar and profound thinker, and professor of what Carlyle called the "dull science" of "political economy," writes each week under the initial of "D," which is understood to represent the first letter of his nom de plume, "Dialecticus," a series of philosophical articles. "D" is a thorough Freethinker. For the medical profession he has almost as much contempt as for the clergy, regarding the latter almost in the same light as James Mill, who looked upon them all as "distributors of theological dust." Doctors, according to "D," thrive on the medical superstitions of the people in much the same way as theologians do on their religious superstitions.

Moral questions "D" treats from the standpoint of a Rationalist who measures the value of all actions by their utility only, allowing no sentimental prejudices, which, to most of us, are the natural growth of our unhealthy circumstances and irrational habits, to warp his judgment. In short, "D.'s" articles are an intellectual treat, and are read by thousands who regard him as a thinker of singular vigor, whose writings hav the great merit of making profound subjects clear even to the most ordinary minds.

Mr. Bradlaugh writes a number of "Jottings" on his Parliamentary labors; sometimes, by way of pleasant exercise, says a few severe things on the Christian's creed in "dialogue," or answers a stupid sermon in a letter to the Rev. Mr. So and So, in which epistle he manages to ask his antagonist, as a general rule, more questions than could be adequately answered in several columns, supposing for a moment—which is a very difficult supposition indeed to one who knows how little the clergy really know—that the questions could be satisfactorily answered at all. Then Mrs. Besant contributes a column of interesting items under the head of "Daybreak," but lately she has had a great deal more to say on "Socialism" than on Freethought. Ever and anon, however, Mrs. Besant feels impelled to return to her proper work, i.e., that of slaying the insidious creeds of Christendom, in which branch of intellectual labor all who hav read her writings know she is quite in her element. Mr. Robertson, as I hav before said, wields a powerful and versatil pen, and when he is not describing the "Sins of the Scottish Kirk," or ridiculing Mrs. Craik's absurd notion of the moral purity of old poets and the writers of the Bible as exhibited in their book, he is singing the praises of some Socialistic scheme of his own manufacture, or taking to task some literary scribe who thinks more highly of Shelley or less highly of Keats as poets than he does himself. Add to these names that of Dr. Lewins, who writes at times to prove that nothing exists in the universe but mind or thought, though why he should take the trouble to pick up an imaginary pen and write an imaginary article for people who hav no existence outside his own perturbed brain has always been a profound mystery to me. But if there's no matter, never mind. Articles from these clever writers appear each week, but I sometimes think that a little freshness would be given to the paper by inserting contributions from other writers, and more especially the younger members of the Freethought party—a course which I am pleased to see is adopted with advantage in your own journal—THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The policy of the National Reformer is the same as when I first took it in 1874, namely: Radical in politics; neo-Malthusian in regard to the increase of population; Atheistic in reference to the gods of religion, and Materialistic in regard to the editors' and contributors' views of the universe.

Though, from a literary standpoint, the National

Reformer is considered by many to be of higher merit than in previous years, when most of its present contributors did not write regularly for it, I am free to confess that I liked it better for the general smartness of its articles when it numbered among its contributors such writers as B. V. (James Thomson), G. W. Foote, Francis Neale, J. P. Adams, and Charles Watts, in addition to its present editors.

Years ago, too, when Mr. Bradlaugh wrote epistles almost weekly to the clergy, they were characterized by a vigorous style, thrilling in their forcefulness; now, however, in laboring after literary accuracy, his contributions lack that verve which gave his early contributions such fascination that he who commenced to read was bound to go on to the end.

In point of age, the Secular Review comes next as an organ of Freethought in England.

Of this journal it need only be said that the eccentric genius before mentioned, Saladin (W. Stewart Ross), is the editor; that his unique writings under the heading of "At Random" occupy a large portion of the paper; that everything he writes is powerfu, though he is disposed to criticise Mr. Bradlaugh's conduct in a manner that is most unfair and ungenerous, and thus put in the hands of the enemies of Freethought a weapon which they do not fail to use against us in the most unscrupulous fashion, and sometimes with the most disastrous effect.

Among the contributors to the Secular Review is that most learned of Biblical commentators, "Julian" —another eccentric genius, Wm. Maccall—and a number of clever writers on philosophical questions.

The policy of the Secular Review is that of Agnosticism, though its special feature a short time ago was Dr. Lewins's fad of "Hylo-Idealism."

Toward all religions its attitude is partly iconoclastic and partly eclectic, the iconoclastic element predominating.

But the Freethought journal that has the largest circulation, and the most influence among the rising generation, is the Freethinker, edited by G. W. Foote. In addition to being a powerful platform advocate, Mr. Foote is one of the tersest and most brilliant writers on Freethought in England. His "Heroes and Martyrs of Freethought" and "Bible Romances," as well as his miscellaneous pamphlets, are not likely to be improved upon by any subsequent writer, at all events, for many years to come.

He is ably assisted by Mr. Joseph Mazzini Wheeler, a gentleman who virtually livs in the reading-room of the British Museum, and who is regarded by those who know him well as one of the best-read men in England.

Mr. Wheeler is a prolific writer. No matter what the subject, he is able to write cleverly upon it; but his own particular theme is "Buddhism."

Mr. W. P. Ball is another of Mr. Foote's confrères on the staff of the Freethinker. This writer has done splendid service to Freethought in the admirable articles he contributed a year or two ago to the National Reformer on "Bible Lessons in Board Schools," in which, in a light, satirical vein, he demonstrated the absurdities and barbarities contained in "holy writ." These articles I hope to some day see reprinted.

Mr. Ball is an Individualist. Though one of the most social men I ever met, he hates the impracticable theories propounded by Socialists, many of whom know very little about the people—their mode of living, their habits, or their aspirations. Recently he took up the cudgels against Mrs. Besant's "Socialism," and, in my opinion, dealt out some very effectiv blows against it. Mrs. Besant, however, was annoyed at the style adopted by the writer, and did not like the illustrations he chose to make, which appear at first sight to be too personal. Mr. Ball would, I am sure, be the last man in the world to abuse an opponent, especially a lady, in lieu of argument; but as he knows from practical experience the absolutely unworkable character of all schemes of Socialism yet formulated, he does not hesitate to point out their worthlessness by the best arguments and illustrations he is capable of using.

I sometimes say a few words to my Freethought brothers and sisters in the columns of the Freethinker myself; but I leave your readers to judge of the merit, or lack of it, in anything I write, by reference to the writings themselvs.

The editor of the Freethinker believes in ridicule; each week on the first page of his journal appears a cartoon representing some ridiculous phase of Bible teaching. I am glad to see THE TRUTH SEEKER adopts this method of pointing out error; I know that a picture is often more effectual in attaining our end than a sober argument would be. People hav to be shocked into thinking. And they are being shocked at a greater rate to-day than at any previous time in the history of the Freethought movement.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Clerical.

Religious preaching has been, in our days, enlisted in the same category with the works of the hammer and the hand. Theological workshops are opened for the beating of brains to fit them to handle the materials from the pew to the pulpit. The elasticity of the steel thus hammered does not last for more than twenty-four hours, nor does it extend beyond the confines of the houses set apart for religious performances. The atmosphere of the places for rehearsals of the tragedy of the fall of man and the farce of salvation is full of all sentiments and passions, more so when it is breathed out from the clerical stages and forced into the nostrils of the guileless children of faith. Human intellect has found that laboring in the sacred cause on the first day pays well for a long rest of the following six days, and this mania has taken possession of the brightest intellect of the present age so that the inherent spiritual light has been totally eclipsed by the natural and human attempts of making most of everything that meets the material wants of the body physical. Spiritual hunger and spiritual thirst are nowhere quenched; nay, even the natural is hardly overcome. Great Talmages and great Beechers rush to the three tables more punctually than the sinner who sits unobserved on one of the back benches in the temple of God.

S. GOVINDA ROW SATTAY, a Hindoo.

The Catholic Factory at Feehanville.

Some months ago I mentioned that magnificent eleemonysary institute, St. Mary's Training School, at Feehanville. After some difficulty, before me lies a borrowed annual report of Brother Leo, superintendent. It is a truly remarkable document, more particularly for what it omits than what it presents. The pamphlet is sixteen pages, containing matter for about half that amount of space, being replete with blank pages, proving more of a blessing to the printer than of practical value to its readers. If "brevity is the soul of wit," Brother Leo must be either a merry old soul or a sound philosopher. Catholic institutions are governed in accordance with the attributes of their God—they are past finding out—and if a careful suppression of facts will accomplish it, they don't propose we shall be much wiser.

We are told the corner-stone of Feehanville was laid in 1882, when nearly $100,000 was raised for the project by his grace the Most Reverend Archbishop Feehan from among wealthy Protestants for this purely non-sectarian training-school. A non-sectarian school under Catholic control would be a rara avis indeed. Well might Milton bewail such hypocrisy as is Feehan's strong point.

> I, under fair pretense of friendly ends,
> And well-placed words of glossy courtesy,
> Baited with reason not implausible,
> Wind me into the easy-hearted man
> And hug him into snares.

"Feehanville differs," we are told, "from penal and reformatory institutions, inasmuch as it does not receive boys convicted of criminal offenses, or boys known to hav vicious or immoral habits," its avowed purpose being to train and educate destitute, homeless boys. Then why in the name of common sense are those boys, who hav not been convicted of crime, and who are not even immoral, committed to this institution by the justices of peace of this county and deprived of their liberty till they attain their majority? Brother Leo regrets that the scope of the school is so limited that it cannot accommodate more, and, as usual, makes a sanctimonious plea for money so that an addition for one thousand more boys may be built. He doubtless equally regrets that there is not an inquisitorial attachment for the benefit of the heretics outside.

That these boys are shut out from contact with the world of fact and sense till twenty-one is an infamous outrage. As a pretext for this addition, the report claims there are many hundred boys in Chicago "roaming the streets, helplessly drifting into misery and degradation." Yet, how comes it that the adults who hav received largely of this highly moral Catholic training, which Feehanville endeavors to impart, form the vast majority of the most degraded people in every community? Catholicism and degradation are considered synonyms! If half of the filth and dirt which I am assured exists in the school obtains, this school is putting its pupils on the highway to degradation. Brother Leo states that one-fourth the prisoners in the House of Correction for 1885 were minors, and pleads for a suitable home and proper training for those wayward youths. If there is one fact patent to the comprehension of all, it is that, judging from results, of all the methods for moral or mental training of young, that of Catholicism is absolutely unsuitable. Remember that Feehanville is not for "boys convicted of crime," as we don't wish to destroy the force of Brother Leo's pleading for the necessity of innocent boys being incarcerated to keep them from contamination of chronic criminals, but rather rejoice with the "more fortunate youth who graduate from a training school where he has enjoyed every advantage capable of fitting him for a noble manhood." Further, "the cost per capita to Cook county for supporting boys in the school is quite insignificant." Is it? Let us see. The special act allows that one hundred boys may be committed by the county of Cook, yet I find that we pay nearly eight thousand dollars per year. The latter fact is not part of the report, but is timely when we read "the extension of the limitations, by our worthy legislatures, would be a boon to the many destitute boys at present debarred by it from being educated at Feehanville." There seems a decided difference of opinion between the boys and Brother Leo about this "boon," for, I am informed, in the short period of its existence more boys hav escaped from it than are at present in this model home, possessing "every advantage capable of fitting the youth for a noble manhood." As the cost per capita is so much more economical, and as it contains, according to the above, all that Harvard or Yale could giv, we expect it to soon be overflowing with real representativs of the first, but reduced families. Possibly those advantages proved perfectly overpowering to the unappreciativ genius, for Feehanville has in reality become a "holy terror" to this class, who much prefer the House of Correction to that of the archbishop. But this only evidences the base ingratitude of the wayward, wilful boys who run away. Failing to catch them, they report them "discharged." Number of boys Jan. 1, 1885, 220; received during the year, 211; discharged, 171; in school Jan. 1, 1886, 260.

The products of the shoe and tailor shops, farm and cattle yards, aggregate $8,417.46; cash receipts from all sources, $24,166.21; total, $32,583.67. With astonishing exactitude the expenditures tally with the cash receipts, among which is an item of $2,397.28 from the United States government. This is supposed to be for the care and education of Indian wards of the government, though I've heard it stated that all but two were gone long ago. The report admits "the large amount of corn, hay, etc., raised necessitated the enlargement of the barns and stables for storage purposes." Its resources, including its four hundred and forty acre farm, buildings, stock, stables, etc., are placed at $102,487.12; liabilities $4,202.87, so that its net assets in four years is $98,284.25. But the real milk of the cocoanut is here: "In it pupils learn those lessons which impart to them a knowledge of their creator, and of their duties to their fellow-men [especially as to the killing of heretics]. These lessons, acquired in youth, are rarely forgotten in after life." Such cant!

'Tis too much proved that, with Devotion's visage and pious action, we do sugar o'er the devil himself.

The report concludes, suggestivly, with the form of a will. If a fire should ever happen at Feehanville, we should hav another such horror as that Indiana orphan asylum. It is a regular fire-trap. Too much time is spent in looking to the welfare of their souls to pay proper attention to their bodies.

Chicago, Ill. E. A. STEVENS.

Agnosticism in a Tennessee Court.

From the Knoxville Journal.

In the circuit court, Monday, Judge Logan presiding, an incident occurred of more than usual interest. A case, involving a small amount of money (an appeal from a justice), in which Mr. Harvey, a well-known operator in marble in this county, was the defendant, was on trial. When Mr. Harvey was called to the witness-stand, Mr. Green, counsel for the plaintiff, asked to put him on his voir dire, when the following substantially occurred:

Q. Mr. Harvey, do you believe in the existence of a God? A. (witness evidently surprised and thinking a moment) I do not believe in God, but I do believe in God, the power that controls the universe.

Q. Do you believe in a future state of rewards and punishments? A. I believe that every human being suffers in this life for every violation of natural and moral laws. Not accepting the Bible as a divine revelation, I know nothing about the future. I do not know whence I came or whither I am going. Therefore I cannot say that I hav any belief as to my future state.

Q. Do you believe in a conscience? A. Most certainly I do. I believe that every sane man has an innate sense of right and wrong to guide his conduct.

BY THE COURT: Mr. Harvey, do you believe in the binding obligation of an oath in a court of justice requiring a witness to tell the truth? A. I do.

The court, after some deliberation, held that the witness was not competent to testify, and he was directed to stand aside.

Exceptions were taken by counsel for defendant, and an appeal taken to the Supreme Court.

After-Dinner Speeches.

A World reporter recently asked Colonel Ingersoll for his experience in after-dinner speaking, and obtained this information: "In the first place, I never made what is called an after-dinner speech. In the second place, I never heard one that I was not sorry that I was present, and would willingly hav given back the dinner for the privilege of leaving the seat. I do not remember to hav read an after-dinner speech that would not destroy the appetite if read before. A speech to be of value must be something that the speaker wants to say—something that he has a reason for saying—something about which he has so great interest, or so great enthusiasm, that he must say it. A speech called forth by the ordinary after-dinner toast—a speech mingled with food and drink, and delivered simply because somebody else wants it, is of no particular value. Of course, this has no reference to stories, which one likes to hear, either before or after dinner."

Call for the Tenth Annual Congress.

To the Auxiliary Secular Unions and to all Citizens of the United States and Canadas who support the Nine Demands of Liberalism:

You are invited to attend the Tenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, to be held in New York city, at Chickering Hall, Fifth avenue and 18th street, on November 11th, 12th, and 13th, and also on Sunday evening, the 14th, a lecture by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, which concludes the Congress.

Pursuant to a vote of the last Congress, notice is hereby given that the following amendments to the constitution of the Union will be acted upon: 1. To reduce the fee for life-membership from $25 to $10. 2. Or, on payment of $10 by applicant for membership, to authorize the secretary to issue ten-year membership certificates, with all the privileges of life-membership during that time. 3. Whenever a man or woman has taken out annual membership certificates for three or five consecutiv years, such person thereafter on payment of annual-membership fee to possess the privilege of life-membership.

The Congress will also be called upon to consider measures for carrying on the work of Freethought, and securing the adoption of such laws by the various state governments and by the national government, as shall make the United States thoroughly Secular, and the repeal of all laws now on the statute-books which conflict with the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

Local auxiliary Unions are entitled by the Union constitution to five representativs in the Congress—the president and secretary and three delegates. All charter-members and life-members, all vice-presidents, all chairmen of state executiv committees, are entitled to seats and votes in the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats but not votes, except by permission of the Congress.

It is hoped that every auxiliary Union will send a full delegation to the Congress, and that every Freethinker in the United States and Canada, who can, will be present.

Per order of board of directors:

R. G. INGERSOLL, President.
SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Secretary.
COURTLANDT PALMER, Treasurer.

An Appeal to Liberals.

It is absolutely necessary to the success of the coming Congress that its sessions should be free. We want full houses and ample reports. We want to make as grand and permanent impression on the public mind as possible. Our president, Robert G. Ingersoll, cannot aid us on this occasion with the full power of his eloquence, but he will be present at the Congress, and to see him and know him is a privilege—the one man of this age who across the centuries can touch hands with Paine and Voltaire, the greatest of the world's reformers. It is fortunate that we of to-day and America hav one who can present our cause with such universal popularity. Like Memnon's statue, unshaken, lofty, he greets the dawning of the day with the most wondrous music that ever fell from human lips, and all our hearts are inspired. The bigots think that clarion voice is still, but it is not. Even his whispered word is potent, and our enemies feel its power, and the Bastile of New Jersey cannot clutch its appointed victim. Ingersoll will be with us, but none the less necessary is it for us of the rank and file to do our work, put our shoulder to the wheel, every one of us who can speak a word or pay a dollar. This Congress is of national importance. What is done here will be felt for years to come. It will giv us a mighty impulse or it will be simply disaster, and everyone who wishes organized Freethought to triumph must lend a hand. We must hav the sinews of war. We must raise money for the expenses of this Congress by private subscription. We want to make no appeals to the Congress in session nor take up any collections.

The expenses will be as follows: Hall rent, $375; speakers, $175; advertising and incidental, $100; total, $650. This amount ought to be raised by the Liberals of the country before the meeting. Whether one comes or not to the Congress he feels an interest in its success, for no matter where he livs, how distantly, he will receive its benefit, its wealth of thought, and new influence for that which is dearest to his own mind. So I ask every Liberal to giv what he can—a dollar, or five dollars, or more, as his circumstances will allow. The amount can be easily raised if every Liberal will do his part. I also ask every Liberal society, if it cannot send delegates, to send some money. That is the next best thing. That will help. Every society will be helped by the Congress, and so we ask its fraternal aid. The following generous contributions already made ought to stir every Liberal to be equally as magnanimous according to his ability. I hope for an immediate response, and that by next week I can report the full amount raised:

CONGRESS FUND.

R. G. Ingersoll	$100.00
Courtlandt Palmer	50.00
E. B. Foote, Sr	25.00
Charles Eckhard	10.00
Peter Eckler	5.00

DELEGATES.

HEMPSTEAD, N. Y., Oct. 25, 1886.

TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE EXECUTIV COMMITTEE OF THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION: The Hempstead Freethought Association has elected delegates to the New York Congress, as follows: C. F. DeMott, H. H. Geer, Robert B. Jackson, Joseph Carman, and Myron Tracy.

Fraternally yours, C. F. DEMOTT.

S. P. PUTNAM, Secretary.

A Plain Talk.

There seems to be so much misunderstanding in regard to the expenditure of the funds of the American Secular Union, and so many unjust accusations and insinuations made, that in advance of the Congress, especially to all those who hav contributed to the fund, it seems best to make a general statement. The figures are not exactly correct, as I hav not the treasurer's report before me, but in substance the expenditures of the past year out of the fund of $3,486 reported in the last TRUTH SEEKER, less $125, pledges not paid, making the total received since last Congress $3,359, are as follows:

Payment of Mr. Watts's salary for May, June, July, and August, 1885	$325
Payment of Mr. Putnam's salary for August and September, 1885	250
Payment of Mr. Putnam's salary from Oct. 8, 1885, to July 8, 1886	1,000
Payment for the expenses of Cleveland Congress	302
Printing pamphlets on Church Taxation, etc	100
Printing circulars, certificates, stationery, etc	125
Expenses of work at Albany	50
Expenses of work, etc., for the opening of museum on Sunday	75
Treasurer's clerk for services	100
Expenses for traveling, hotel and railroad, stamps, stationery, and incidentals, together with hall rent and advertising for lectures	1,032
Total	$3,359

In explanation of the above I will say: Mr. Watts desired to visit England during May, June, July, and August of 1885, and wished his salary to be paid in advance. There being no money in the treasury, the sum, $500, was paid Mr. Watts by parties as follows: Courtlandt Palmer, $200; D. A. Blodgett, $200, and C. Edelheim, $100; with the understanding that the amount should be paid back by the American Secular Union, which has been done to the extent of $325—namely, $200 to Mr. Palmer, $75 to Mr. Edelheim, and $50 to Mr. Blodgett—leaving $150 still due Mr. Blodgett and $25 due Mr. Edelheim.

The Cleveland Congress, outside of Mr. Ingersoll's lecture, cost about $750. Of this, $348 was raised by the citizens of Cleveland and admissions at the door, leaving $302 to be paid out of the Campaign Fund.

In view of these facts and figures I want to ask the Liberals of this country a few questions.

I wish to know if there is a single Liberal who thinks that $1,500 is too large a salary for the secretary. If so, I would like to hav him speak out and giv his reasons. This amount was voted by the Congress at Cassadaga and by the board of directors. The secretary has devoted himself exclusivly to the work of the Union. He has taken no vacation. He has traveled about twelve thousand miles the past year. He has delivered nearly two hundred lectures, which would make $7.50 per lecture, if he receives his whole salary. Having received only two-thirds of his salary, this makes about $5 per lecture. He has written four hundred columns for the newspapers, and hundreds of letters. Twenty new societies hav been formed, twenty life-members added, and five hundred annual members. Work has been carried on at Albany for church taxation, and in New York city for the opening of museums on Sunday, etc. I desire the Liberals of America to say whether $1,500 is too much salary for the amount of labor thus performed.

It seems to be the impression of some that the secretary is "grabbing" all the money in the treasury, and that no one else has a chance to receive any benefit from the funds. The above figures show the falsity of this impression. It will be seen that as a matter of fact the secretary has received only $1,000 for this year's work, and for the past four months he has worked without a cent of salary. He has been accused of taking a pleasure trip to the Yellowstone Park, with $3,000 to back him up. Be it understood that the secretary out of his private funds paid his own expenses to the Park, and it did not cost the Union anything. The secretary has not taken a pleasure trip of any sort at the expense of the Union. He has charged only lecture expenses to the Campaign Fund, and he who asserts or insinuates anything to the contrary is simply a slanderer.

It is said that the work done during the past year is not satisfactory. What more could hav been done, I ask, and what better success achieved against formidable odds? Was not the work at Albany for church taxation a good work? Was not the work for the opening of museums on Sunday, the securing of ten thousand names to a petition, etc., a good work? Was not the lecture trip in the Great West—in Montana, Idaho, Utah, Wyoming, Colorado, Nebraska, Iowa, Kansas, Illinois, Michigan, and Ohio—and the formation of societies, a good work? I am frank to say that I am proud of the work done during the past year. I am not ashamed of it one bit. If one is dissatisfied, let him say why he is dissatisfied. Let him show what better things can be accomplished.

It has been asserted by some that the American Secular Union is run by a "ring." Was a more preposterous accusation ever made? What has this "ring" done? Simply work of public and universal benefit. It has labored for Liberalism throughout the country. In what way has any single individual been benefited by the Union at the expense of others? In every respect the wishes of the Congress hav been carried out. Will anyone point out anything to the contrary? The secretary certainly can't belong to that "ring"—for, if he did, it isn't to be supposed that he would work four months without a salary. It is the disposition of a "ring" to lay its hands on everything for its own use. Point to a single act of this kind. Point to a single expenditure that has not been for the public good. Of course the secretary must do many things on his own responsibility. He must exercise his personal judgment. This is the only way to do business. But the secretary is responsible ultimately to the Congress—and that responsibility he is willing to meet. He will stand on his record. But don't make accusations until that record is known.

Now, friends and Liberals of America, is it just, is it wise, is it generous, is it noble, to make such accusations, to find fault simply because one is trying to do something, to criticise and seek to destroy a work of promis? Liberals should be ashamed of this, they should turn from it with disgust and abhorrence. It has gone far enough, this backbiting, this gossip and scandal, this stabbing in the dark. It is doing irreparable injury. Surely among Liberals there should be generosity, fraternity, frankness, speech face to face, honorable combat and noble difference, if such there must be.

The coming Congress is of vast importance. It will decide whether organized Liberalism is a failure or not. I believe in the ideas of Liberalism. If I am all alone, still they are lofty and beautiful; still they warm, and cheer, and make the hardest pathway a delight. Can these ideas be organized, or are they too lofty, too beautiful, in the heavens of our own thought, for outward and fraternal association? I cannot believe this. Liberalism should not be simply intellectual, but social. It should be humanitarian. It should unite for action. But the grandest action can only be by coöperation. That coöperation, however, should be on a lofty plane. It should be a union of the highest and the best.

Let it be understood that the American Secular Union is not a charitable institution. When the Union becomes an object of charity let it be buried ten thousand fathoms deep. We want no favor, no pity, no begging. This is simply a matter of business, of supply and demand, of what the Liberals of America really desire, and because they desire are willing to pay for, as they will pay for a good dinner, or a book, or newspaper, or for anything that pleases. The work of the Union is before the Liberals of the country. The question is, Do they like it? Is it a pleasure to them? Does it benefit them individually to see this effort prosper, and are they willing to pay for it—a dollar, or two dollars, or ten dollars, or a hundred dollars—as they can afford. I want no charity and no patronage. I simply despise these, and if the American Secular Union is a burden to Liberals, if they support with the feeling that they are doing something charitable, if they support it merely out of good will and kindness, and not from a genuin feeling that it is necessary to meet the demands of the individual and the universal race—if this is all the sentiment that keeps the Union alive, then it ought to perish. Death is infinitly more glorious than life on such beggarly terms. If the Liberals of America continue the Union, they must do it as a matter of business, not of charity. They must be willing to pay for it as they pay for any good thing, anything that is a satisfaction and a delight. Put the Union on the basis of its actual value—of what each one considers it worth to him, to his family, to his community, to the nation, and to the world.

I hav spoken frankly because I feel deeply. I want the Union to succeed, but I want it to succeed honorably. I want to work in this cause, but I want also to preserve my independence and my pride, and I want the Union to do the same thing. I want it to hav a vigorous vitality. I want it to be supported, not by the few, but by the many. I want it to be no man's almoner, but the expressiv force of the thousands of Liberals of this land. Shall the spirit of fraternity prevail? Shall jealousy cease and nobility triumph? I hope for this. Glorious, however, as Liberalism is in its lofty ideals, which can never perish, what I hav said will show that when it comes to practical labor there is bitterness as well as joy. For the last two years the greatest suffering, the most cruel and savage attacks, the most unjust accusations, the most malign slanders, hav come, not from "Christians," but from "Liberals." Is organization essentially orthodox and does it destroy manhood and generosity, and must each one therefore press on in his own way? Or can we not in the purity of our thought still unite for a common work in honorable emulation? SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Liberal Club.

The services at the 420th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club were conducted by Mr. James Redpath, and were of a devotional character, Henry George being the object of worship. The man with a badge-pin tarried late at home to avoid the political swirls which rage wherever two or three are gathered together in these times without being called to order. He freely admits to taking no interest in the election of the next mayor. He remembers distinctly having been at different times convinced, by the eloquence of their advocates, that his duty to the nation required him to vote for three separate and distinct candidates for that office. As only one of these can be elected, it looks to him as though New York were destined to land somewhere between the devil and the deep sea.

It costs but five cents to attend a meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club. The visitor placed that amount in pennies on the treasurer's table, and took a seat. Mr. Redpath, wearing a skull-cap and looking very much like a priest, was talking with considerable rapidity on the subject of the ownership of land. Land, he said, should be held in the interests of the whole people. Of all other commodities there could be manufactured almost unlimited quantities. Not so with land; the amount of it could not be increased under any circumstances. Taxes should be upon land, thus preventing any one from dodging taxes. Land cannot be concealed. If a man owns more than one hundred acres, make the tax so excessiv that he will want to sell. The nation should own the mines, which could be worked by the government, the proceeds going to pay government expenses. The road beds of the railroads should be the property of the state; the rolling stock to be owned by individuals. Insurance on life and property are properly state affairs, poll and property taxes being exacted to provide for the payment of the policies. Wills must be abolished. It is the province of the dead to go back to earth, not to control the living. Patents and copyrights should be nontransferable, so that inventors and writers, instead of capitalists, may gather the fruits of their own genius. Exorbitant rents, collection of debts by law, child labor and the labor of women outside the household, must go. No more of the contract system in prisons. Put convicts on public works. Make license for selling liquor a thousand dollars. Hand all factories over to the state. Make a law against building a house so that the sun cannot shine into every room. Go to the polls Tuesday, with the rest of the one hundred and twenty thousand, and vote for Henry George. (Loud and prolonged applause.)

Having spoken on this subject for an hour, Mr. Redpath put his skull-cap in his pocket, donned a derby hat, and went away to address other meetings.

The Chair now called attention to the card for the following month. The farce of dedicating a statue of Liberty would be discussed at the next meeting. The questions presented by the present lecturer must be treated thoughtfully, scientifically, and sociologically. There should be no political rhetoric or intemperance of expression. The floor was now open.

The Chair's restrictions came near killing the debate, but in response to a demand from the audience Dr. Eccles was induced to open the discussion. Remarking that this calling upon Eccles first every time was assuming the character of a chestnut, the doctor proceeded to point out the errors into which Mr. Redpath had inadvertently fallen. Women should be allowed to do any kind of work they chose. He believed the ladies present would indorse that view. A soft clapping of hands here showed that the doctor, either by his logic or his good looks, had scored a point with the lady members. The time of this speaker was extended to twenty minutes.

It took Dr. Weeks some time to correct Dr. Eccles's misunderstanding of Mr. Redpath. Politics, said Dr. Weeks, is demagogism. Competition now is between workingmen. Monopoly has done its work, and must sink into innocuous disuse.

Captain Clark opposed the eight-hour law. He believed he had a right to work eight, twelve, or sixteen hours a day. The arrogant claims of capital sink into utter insignificance compared with the monumental nerve of labor organizations.

Lawyer Chamberlain followed in a defense of Henry George, and urged his election in an eloquent speech.

At the usual hour the club adjourned.

The program for the following month is the best yet. November 2d the president of the club, members, and guests will talk about "The Pharisees and the Uninvited at the Inauguration of the Statue of Liberty. Shall it Remain a Sublime Sarcasm?" On the 12th the meeting will adjourn to Chickering Hall to attend the Congress of the American Secular Union. On the 19th "The Practical Socialism now Being Organized by Americans at Sinaloa, Mexico," by John W. Lovell, publisher of "Lovell's Library;" and on the 26th Andrew H. Smith speaks upon "Alcohol and the Human System in the Light of Science." Thus do the cohorts of the truth assault delusion's castle, storm the redoubt, drive falsehoods out, and with old errors rastle. It costs but five cents to see the fight.

The Chicago Secular Union.

On Sunday evening, Oct. 24th, the Chicago Secular Union elected its officers for the ensuing six months. Mr. E. A. Stevens was unanimously elected president; vice-presidents, Mr. Charles Frankel, Mr. A. M. Freeman, and Professor Orchardson; secretary, Mrs. A. M. Freeman; financial secretary, Miss Stella Campbell; treasurer, Mr. A. M. Freeman. The delegates appointed to attend the Tenth Annual Congress of the National Secular Union, to be held in New York city on the 11th of November, are Mr. E. A. Stevens, Gen. M. M. Trumbull, Mr. Charles Frankel, Dr. McCleod, and Mrs. A. M. Freeman.

The Union is flourishing. We hav good audiences, and with so earnest a worker and efficient an officer as Mr. Stevens has proved himself to be, we can look forward to a successful winter. We hav had some very fine lectures since reopening this fall, and hav quite an array of talent promised for the winter course. Among those who hav already occupied our rostrum, is remembered with appreciation Mr. Putnam, who remained a few days with us on his way East from his Western trip. Mr. Stevens gave a grand lecture before the Union Sunday evening. But Mr. Stevens, as Mr. Putnam, is too well known as an advanced thinker to need any words of eulogy. Gen. M. M. Trumbull, by request, spoke two weeks ago on Thomas Jefferson. It is to be hoped that Mr. Trumbull will publish his lecture, for it was a most eloquent, original, and brilliant exposition of the life and teachings of a great man. It would be a splendid thing as an educator to publish in THE TRUTH SEEKER. It would be a revelation to orthodoxy and a bomb in the camp of political conservatism.

Mr. Watts was in Chicago this month, and gave two excellent lectures. In the afternoon he spoke on "Atheism and the French Revolution," and in the evening on "Saints or Sinners—Which?"

The latter is sharp, incisiv, bristling with wit and humor, and is pretty rough on the saints. The sinners smile approvingly at its telling sarcasm, and, as Mr. Watts says in his discourse, in regard to matrimony, that he happened to get a sinner, so the audience are delighted that the lecturer is a sinner too. In "Atheism and the French Revolution," Mr. Watts has laid all Freethinkers under lasting obligation. Perhaps nothing has been so often used as an argument against Freethought as the excesses of the French Revolution. Mr. Watts completely demolishes the claim that Atheism was in any way responsible for the atrocities perpetrated at that time, and refers them back to where all thinkers might hav been assured they belonged—the tyranny, superstition, and power of the Catholic church. Every Freethinker should hear this lecture, and see to it that his orthodox neighbor hears it also. It deals not more with France in 1793 than with America to-day. Mr. Watts's address is 82 Berkeley street, Toronto, Canada. Let the Liberals in every community club together and send for Mr. Watts, and it will be found in an evening or two that he can refute all the arguments the parson has been laboring the 365 Sundays of the year to construct. It is only in this way, by discussions, lectures, Freethought papers, etc., that we can accomplish the work of the Union. Let every Freethinker, then, see to it that he himself takes a Freethought paper, and, if possible, that his neighbor takes one too. But, as much good as the papers must do, the lecturer also is a necessity. The people need to come in contact with the leaders, to meet them face to face, to feel their earnestness and enthusiasm. The old camp-meeting of the Methodists is a good illustration, and for this reason it is to be hoped that as many as possibly can will attend the Tenth Annual Congress in New York.

Oct. 27, 1886. MRS. A. M. FREEMAN,
Secretary Chicago Secular Union.

The New York State Association.

The New York Liberals, realizing that the time has come to make an extra effort for the purpose of advancing the cause in the state, are endeavoring to raise a fund for the work. The aim of the association is to establish Secular Societies and Science Schools in every neighborhood, not for the purpose of saying harsh things against the church, but to remove prejudice, and build up societies for mutual improvement. The church offers so many advantages for social intercourse that, rather than be ostracized, many Liberals attend and help support the church.

Let us remedy this by organization, by regular weekly meetings, socials, and entertainments, where all the talent of the society can be made to count. The children would in this be a factor in constructiv Liberalism.

We should hav Lesson Leaves prepared that there might be a unanimity in the work throughout the state. By working systematically to substitute science for theology, and by earnest, honest, useful lives, we may demonstrate that this life is worth living.

We do not ask nor expect an appropriation from the state, but we do expect Liberals throughout the length and breath of the state to respond to the appeal made, and to work for this object.

We want men, women, and children interested. Liberals, polish up your talents, unite to do this work!

As secretary of the State Association I want to enroll the name of every true Liberal on the membership list. Come up to the help of the weak against the mighty. We will blow no horns, but if we do this we shall see the walls of superstition fall down.

MEMBERS AND DONATIONS.

The Executiv Committee of the New York State Freethinkers' Association will hold a special meeting at New York city, Nov. 14th, to devise and perfect plans for more efficient and thorough propaganda work. In the meantime, if any members of the New York Freethinkers' Association are desirous of special effort being made in their neighborhood, write at once to the secretary, Mrs. F. C. Reynolds, North Parma, New York, who will respond to invitations to lecture. There is no lack of able and ready help for all who desire it. Let all who wish to hav a Secular society and science school on Sunday in their neighborhood write her at once. Donations and membership fees of the New York Freethinkers' Association to October 17th are as follows:

A Presidential Error.

IN his Thanksgiving proclamation Grover Cleveland says:

"And while we contemplate the infinit power of God in earthquake, flood, and storm, let the grateful hearts of those who hav been shielded from harm through his mercy be turned in sympathy and kindness toward those who hav suffered through his visitations."

Did Mr. Cleveland reflect when he wrote this that his recommendation is flying in God's face? If God punished the Charleston people by an earthquake, it was because he wanted them punished, and any alleviation of their misery is shielding them from God's will. What is the use of God's going to the trouble and expense of an earthquake to punish his people if worldly sinners, without the fear of the Lord in their hearts, at once make their punishment void by setting them on their feet again? Go to, Grover! Let the Charleston folks suffer, or do not put the blame upon God.

Communications.

Serious Musings of a Humorist.

Is this a republican government we are living under, I wonder? If it is, then must the government of hades be republican, I think. Why? Well, the parsons, presumably posted, tell us of the sort of spirits that rule in the unlocated, but doubtless very populous, region above named, and, knowing too well ourselvs the sort of spirits that rule in this "land of the free"—so called, ironically, from the fact that it is a land of slaves, by veriest despots ruled—why shouldn't one conclude that the two governments are alike, the two sets of rulers being of the one stripe?

The people of a republic are popularly supposed to be themselvs the rulers of their land by those of outlying and "effete monarchies," and some of themselvs no doubt lay the flattering unction to their souls that they are the rulers of their country, and are happy. Well, they are mightily fooled; but to disabuse them would be to rob them of their complacency. The blatherskiting stump orator, office-holder, or office-seeker comes to the front at a political meeting and thunders out: "You are the people. We are your servants. The people are the rulers. We but do their bidding. The people are the sovereigns. We bow to and obey the people." Lies and taffy, taffy and lies. But we go away from the meeting head and spirits up, proud to think we are "sovereigns." The blatherskiting demagog goes away laughing down in his boots, and praying, "Lord, may the fools increase and multiply!"

Whom hav the "sovereigns" of this "land of the free" deputed to look after their national, state, and municipal affairs—to whom delegated the power to govern them, the "sovereigns?" For the answer, take a look around in the high places and low places of the political arena and see corruptionists of every grade and hue—no place is too high for their flight and no place too low for their descent.

Heaven and earth, what an array of officials! The great, very great majority of whom are seeking to feather their nests, and accomplishing their aims at the expense of the "dear people." Diogenes, with a Fresnal light, would hav to hunt long ere he discovered an honest man among them. Does place in a republican rule make rascals of honest men? Or were they rascals in embryo ere coming to place, and the "sovereigns" deceived or indifferent?

Well, it looks like indifference—reckless indifference at that—and as the "sovereigns" would resent being called blockheads or fools, to reckless indifference must be charged the fact of their having installed a legion of rascals in place and power. Of such are the "servants" whom the American "sovereigns" elect to do their offices for them, in the doing of which they "do" the "sovereigns" with a vengeance, "do" 'em brown," as it were! Yet the latter look indifferently on, and smile, as they boast of their grand republic, the freest and most glorious government on the face of the earth, which it is—for office-holders! And these office-holders—"dealers," dickerers, "jobbers," and robbers, by a large majority—are Christians and god-fearing men, professedly—if they had more fear of the devil it would be better for the country—and in the guise of such riot in all sorts of corruption, stopping at nothing in their greed for gold—Christians who are taking the chances of eleventh-hour repentance!

To come right down to hard-pan, this republican government of ours, as administered and allowed to be by the "sovereigns," is a dismal failure, and, as man is constituted, I doubt if this form of government would ever prove a success. It might work well with a higher order of beings, but with man it has ever proved, is proving to-day, and will ever prove, a fiasco; unless, in the coming ages, he shall evolute to a pitch of understanding that will enable him to govern, and giv him the requisit grace to submit to be governed, in a truly republican manner. But this, if ever, will be in the far, far distant future, when this old globe will be so enlarged by accretion from exploded comets and things, as it journeys through the star-studded regions of space, or so reduced by attrition in its rush through the debris of disintegrated, celestial worlds, that the present-day man, meeting her by moonlight alone, or any other light, wouldn't recognize old Mother Earth—wouldn't know her from a leather football or celestial spheroid of the first magnitude.

Look at this republic, so vaunted and extolled by spread-eagle orators and flamboyant editors—at its rulers and the way it is ruled—and say it is a success if you can. Why, it is worse than a dismal failure, it is a wicked failure, viewed in the light of the nineteenth century, when such progress should hav been made by man in the direction of good government for man as would hav made us all wonder whether or not the millennium would usher in any improvement—this, were man a highly progressiv animal, which he is not, however, but a slow-coach with this regard.

In days of yore the Roman lion (the populace) was wont at times to go about the streets of Rome roaring mightily with anger fierce. It was then the triumvirs, the tribunes, the consuls, the emperors, and what not, were wont to shake in their boots, for the day of reckoning had come for certain of them, and accounts were to be squared. In the days of the present, the American lion—bah! the American lion is a sheep, and sleeps the sleep of a sheep, rarely bleating, much less roaring, and the rascals in the places of honor and trust for them provided, riot in venality and corruption, fearing no day of reckoning with the sleeping sheep!

I am sorry to say that I think this republic is dying, dying of the gangrene of political and official corruption. It is blood poisoned and booked for extinction. It might rally were the populace a lion and not a sheep. Sooner or later it will die, and those who lay it away forever may speculate as to what the American Republic might hav been had it not started in until about the year 1,000,000, with a higher order of man in vogue. The Sibylline Oracles.

GREELEY, Sept. 25, 1886.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Are there any prophecies at all resembling those in the Bible among the heathen writings? If so, please let me know where they can be found and oblige IGNORAMUS.

A correspondent of THE TRUTH SEEKER wishes to know if there are any prophecies among the heathen writings at all resembling those in the Bible. We answer Yes. The Sibylline oracles, which existed long before the Christian era, were destroyed during the burning of Rome, A.D. 66, but like some of the Old Testament books, which were lost or destroyed during the Babylonish captivity and afterward re-written from memory or tradition, so a new collection of the pagan books was made after the fire in Rome. These books are quoted by the early Christian fathers as the word of God, and so great was their estimation and use in the church of the second and third centuries that Christians were nicknamed Sibyllists.

The most celebrated of the Sibylline books, the Erythrean, contains an acrostic in Greek, now extant, the initial letters of which are:

Iesous Chreistos, Theou Uios, Soter, Stauros.
(Jesus Chreist, God's Son, Savior, Stake.)

Cicero, who was born 106 B.C., assails the Sibyl's prophecy as too vague in regard to the great person whose coming is foretold. He further says:

> But that they (the verses) proceed not from fury and prophetic rage, but rather from art and contrivance, doth no less appear otherwise than from the Acrostic in them.

Eusebius, the first church historian, affirms that Cicero quoted these very verses which contain the acrostic.

Dionysius of Halicarnassus, who lived more than thirty years before Christ, and Varro, who was born 116 B.C., both speak of disputes in their day about the genuinness of the acrostics—as if there were more than the one in their time.

The early Christians asserted the genuinness of the Sibylline prophecies; modern Christians would fain repudiate them. Their antiquity is as certain as that of any New Testament writings, which some of them no doubt antedate. It is a humiliating alternativ to which Dr. Lardner and other Christian apologists hav been driven of admitting that the Sibylline acrostic was either a pagan prophecy of Christ or a Christian forgery. Justin Martyr (A.D. 150), the earliest Christian writer of undisputed authenticity, says:

> The most ancient and time honored Sibyl, whose books are preserved in all the world . . . clearly and manifestly prophesies concerning the predicted advent of our savior Jesus Christ, and concerning all those things that were to be done by him.

The authenticity of Justin's "Address to the Greeks," in which this passage occurs, has been questioned, but not its antiquity. The Christian translator says it "was not written later than the third century."

Now, those clear and manifest prophecies of the advent of Jesus Chreist are found only in the eighth book of the Sibyl, which contains the acrostic, and in the first book. But the first book, says the author of "Oracula Sibyllina" (Prof. C. Alexandre, Paris, 1856), "is, without doubt, later than Justin, and is in part made up from the eighth book." And the learned Christian author not only believes that the eighth book was written between A.D. 98 and 138, but does not doubt that Justin referred to the same. Dr. Lardner was unwilling to concede that any of the books were written earlier than A.D. 117, and Professor Alexandre's reason for assigning an earlier date is that he finds in the eighth book a passage resembling one in John's gospel, which he believes was written before A.D. 98. The resemblance, however, is only in idea, not in words, and who knows that the Sibyl did not precede John?

Furthermore, Professor Alexandre thinks the acrostic was written between A.D. 96 and 117, the rest of the book somewhat later, but all before A.D. 138.

Now, Justin, in his undoubtedly genuin "Apology," quotes the Sibyl as saying that "there should be a dissolution by God of all things corruptible"—the very theme of the Acrostic, and what follows in the eighth book. This book contains 501 lines, and about half of it relates to Christ. We are not aware that any English translation of it exists, or even of the Acrostic. Professor Alexandre givs a Latin translation, and all his notes and essays are in Latin.

Irenæus (A.D. 190) writing against the Gnostics, speaks of the name of "Christ the Son" (Uios Chreistos) being composed of twelve letters. These two Greek words contain twelve letters, ch being one letter. Hippolytus, his disciple, also descants at length on Chreistos of the heretics.

Tertullian (A.D. 210) calls Jesus Christ Ichthus (a fish); he says that "we little fishes, after the example of our Ichthus, are born in water." And the Christian translator of Tertullian says in a note:

> The word Ichthus in Greek means a fish, and it was used as a name of our Lord Jesus because the initials of the words Iesous Christos Theou Uios Soter make up that word.

The Greek Acrostic is remarkable for spelling Chreistos with an e. The word, therefore, could not hav been derived from chrio, "to anoint," but may hav been derived from "chreo (also chreio), Ionic for chrao, to deliver an oracle" (Don. Lex.).

Another remarkable thing about the Acrostic is that the initial letters of the words Iesous Chreistos Theou Uios Soter spell IChThUS, "a fish." One of the three great prevailing sects in India is the Vaishnavas, or worshipers of Vishnu, whose astronomical symbol is the fish, whose first incarnation was in the body of a fish, and whose ninth and last was in the person of Christna, also called by his disciples Jezeus (Anacalypsis, and Bible in India).

And speaking of fish, Professor Alexandre's work exhibits another ancient Acrostic with a fish in it, also a savior and Galileans. The fish is most conspicuous, being invoked as a divinity, and forming part of the first letters of the lines of the Acrostic which are ICHTHUS EIS AIE, "fish forever." It is an epitaph on stone, and the author dates it about the middle of the fourth century, but we suspect it to be earlier. The only word in the inscription answering to Christos is bereft of all but the first letter and follows "fish." It may therefore be a pagan epitaph, Ichthu Ch[reste], "sweet fish."

Constantine, in his oration to the clergy, appeals to the prophecy of the Erythrean Sibyl as declaring "the history of Jesus" and "a certain testimony of Christ's divinity." Rendering the Greek initial letters into Latin, Jesus Christus, Dei Filius, Servator Crux, he adds:

> It is evident that the virgin [Sibyl] uttered these verses under the influence of divine inspiration; and I cannot but esteem her blessed whom the savior thus selected to unfold his gracious purposes toward us. Many, however, who admit that the Erythrean Sibyl was really a prophetess, yet refuse to credit this prediction, and imagin that some one professing our faith and not unacquainted with the poetic art, was the composer of these verses. They hold, in short, that they are a forgery. The truth, however, in this case is evident, since the diligence of our countrymen has made a careful computation of the times, so that there is no room to suspect that this poem was composed after the advent and condemnation of Christ, or that the general report is false that the verses were a prediction of the Sibyl in an early age. For it is allowed that Cicero was acquainted with this poem, which he translated into the Latin language and incorporated with his own works.

This question is treated at length in the "Revelations of Antichrist," from which most of the above is copied. Christian scholars who assign the composition of the Sibylline Oracles to even as early a period as A.D. 96–138, or later, are, in our judgment, mistaken. We believe that the Acrostic and most, if not all of the Eighth Book that follows, existed in the time of Cicero and Varro, which was our conviction ten years ago, and it was greatly strengthened when two years later, we discovered that Jesus and his apostles all lived and died before the Christian era.

The Sibylline Oracles appear to be the only religious pagan book that has come down to us; but the learned author, De Pauw, in his "Philosophical Dissertations on the Greeks" (English translation, 1793), makes a plausible argument to show that the Greeks had a holy Bible. He says:

> Few, even of the learned, are informed at this day that the Athenians possessed a prophetic and mysterious book, called in their language the "Testament," on which they pretended the safety of the republic depended. It was preserved with so much care that no passage has ever transpired, and consequently the notions transmitted to us are very confined, but the conjectures they lead to are infinit. The work of darkness appears, however, to hav been of the same nature with the books of the Sibyls at Rome.

And the author more than suspects that the Sibylline books of Rome were only an imitation of the Athenian Testament, adapted to the paganisms of the Latins.

In expressing our conviction that these pagan oracles antedate the Christian era, we do not admit that they contain any real prophecies. Those relating to Jesus Christ were doubtless written after he was put to death, about 75 years B.C. ANTICHRIST.

"THE true Christian," said the Rev. H. Ward Beecher, the other day, "should be luminous." Perhaps Queen Mary thought the same, comments T. F. Gould, when she set her fellow Christians alight at Smithfield and Oxford.

Roman Catholicism vs. French Republicanism.

Theodore Stanton in the Independent.

The expulsion of the French princes, the performances of General Boulanger, minister of war, the election of the councilors-general for the departments, and several minor episodes in the political life of France during the past summer hav led many good people to see in each one of these acts a blow struck at the existence of the Third Republic. But all these temporary dangers sink to nothingness when compared with that ever-abiding one, the hostility of Roman Catholicism.

The Paris Temps, the leading Republican daily, published, a few months ago, a series of valuable letters touching on this very subject. Their aim was to account for the defeat in certain departments of so many Republican candidates at the general elections of last autumn for members of the Chamber of Deputies. As I hav not seen them mentioned in America, and as they afford a new and astounding revelation of the power exerted by the clergy in the field of politics, they cannot but prove of interest at this time when so many observers think they see setting in the decline of the French republic. For my own part, however, I do not believe that such a crisis exists, but if it does come, it will be mainly due to the influences and labors described in the rest of this article.

Speaking of the department of Landes, one of the correspondents of the Temps said:

> The peasants are, for the most part, ignorant, and more superstitious than religious. Many of them still believe in sorcerers who are capable of working charms and of smiting animals with disease and death. They are also convinced that the village priest can exorcise the evil spell, and he is often called in to bless the flocks stricken, it may be, with rot. The farmers liv so near together, and the parishes are so small, that the priests can exert an immediate and constant influence. . . . There are only ten newspapers in the whole department, and all of them together do not ordinarily print more than five thousand copies. This fact shows the intellectual condition of the Landes farmers.

This was the very kind of material for the wily priests to manipulate, and it is scarcely necessary to say that they made the most of it. One of the candidates writing from Coudure, in this department, says: "The clergy had been saying for a long time that all our afflictions, the phylloxera, etc., are sent us by God to punish us for deserting him. The supreme effort was made on the morning of election-day (Sunday), when our priest, in a tone of intense indignation, shouted from the pulpit, referring to the Republicans, 'Let them leave us at least our sanctuary, our altar, our cross, that we may kiss it for the last time with our expiring breath!' This tirade, spoken in a tragic manner, was a tremendous blow to the republican cause in this town, for it must not be forgotten that Coudure has a swarm of priests in embryo, and that the women, worked upon for a long time by our priest, must, on leaving the church, hav implored their husbands to vote against us. It is, therefore, the priest above all who defeated me at Coudure."

These village priests simply took their cue from their bishops. Ten days before the elections, one of these ecclesiastical functionaries wrote as follows to the faithful in his see: "It is sad to remark how all the elements seem to conspire to prevent the earth from giving you a proper return for the hard labor that you hav bestowed upon it. For too long a time already the fond hopes that are born with every spring end only in disappointment. Your fields are ravaged by storms, or frost, or floods; unknown diseases attack your vinyards, and still more terrible maladies [referring to the cholera in Spain, whose frontier is within sight of the department of Landes] that decimate and kill in an instant, are raging about us. . . . When God is denied, is it astonishing that he affirms his existence? When the cross that he brought the world is banished from the schoolroom, from the court house, and even from the cemetery; when an effort is made to efface his very name by not allowing it to be pronounced in the presence of school-children; when his religion is treated as an enemy and his priests insulted, is it surprising that he takes vengeance?"

The good bishop then goes on to tell the faithful how they should vote, and it is not necessary to state that he does not recommend the republican ticket; and when it is borne in mind that this pastoral letter was read by the priest of every church in the see, that its contents served as a text to many a pulpit attack on "the powers that be," and that all these imprecations were listened to by a most superstitious peasantry, who believe that bishops and priests are possessed of the divine inflatus—when we remember these circumstances we cannot be surprised that the republic suffered a disastrous defeat in the department of Landes.

The department of Basses-Pyrenees lies between the department of Landes and the Spanish frontier, and is made up of the old province of Béarn, the nativ land of Henry IV., and the Pays Basque. The atmosphere of this corner of France seems to be still pervaded by the spirit of the olden time. Even Pau, the capital of the department, the resort of tourists from all parts of Europe and America, is, as regards intellectual progress, almost a century behind Paris. The people in the streets all speak a patois, and if you walk three or four miles out into the country, you meet peasants who do not even understand French. Nor can the inhabitants of one-half of the department converse with those of the other half; the language of the Pays Basque and the patois of Béarn are as different as French and English. What a soil for Catholicism to flourish in!

"In the Pays Basque," writes the Temps correspondent, "it is the religious question, above all, that served as the electoral platform of the opponents of the republic. The physiognomy of this region is absolutely original. Everybody speaks Basque, a language whose origin is as obscure as that of the inhabitants themselvs. . . . The whole country is profoundly religious. Republicans and monarchists alike are declared Deists, and both are proud to proclaim the fact. On account of the dispersed situation of the farms it is extremely difficult to introduce the republican idea into the Pays Basque. The voter cannot be reached except by the priest, who sees him each Sunday at church, and visits him at his home during the week. The churches, isolated like the houses, are kept in good repair, and are the unique weekly meeting-place of the Basques. . . . The population cannot be said to hav political opinions. Religious, that is to say, Catholic by habit and tradition, the people hav a blind faith in their priests. . . . It is the suppression of the teaching of the catechism in the schools that enabled the priests most to exercise an influence over the faithful on election day. They declared plainly that they would not undertake this task. But the poor and ignorant parents, busy all day in the fields, could not act the part of the village schoolmaster, so that, although considering an understanding of the catechism to be indispensable to their children, they found themselvs unable to teach it to them. Hence arose a strong feeling of unfriendliness for the republican government. On the approach of the elections, the priests did not fail to take advantage of the situation in order to obtain votes against the enemies of religion.

"The Pays Basque is a nursery of ecclesiastics. A family considers it a great honor to hav one of its members take orders. Just before the elections all the ecclesiastical nativs of the country went home and begged their friends to vote the monarchical ticket. A certain member of the chapter of the cathedral of Bordeaux visited every house in his nativ township, which usually givs a Republican majority of one hundred. This year the Monarchists carried it by two hundred majority. . . . A few days before the vote all the priests were summoned to a retreat at the bishop's, and when they returned, they began openly to electioneer, inviting, from the pulpit, their parishioners to come to the parsonage in order to receive advice as to how one should vote."

Much the same story comes from the department of Hautes-Pyrenees, which lies also on the Spanish frontier and next to the department of Basses-Pyrenees. Just as in the Pays Basque, the mountain villages of this department furnish an immense number of priests to the state church. "The result is," says the Temps correspondent, "that the clergy exercise a powerful influence, and their intervention in an electoral campaign is sufficient to decide the result." The suppression of the catechism in the primary schools, and the well-known tendency of the Republicans toward requiring theological students to undergo service in the army—these two questions brought out the priests of the department in battle array; and the Republican candidates were consequently defeated.

Going into the heart of southern France, into the backward department of l'Aveyron, the correspondent observes: "The more I advance in this inquiry through the South, the more I am convinced that the religious question was preponderant in the late elections. My impression may be summed up in these words: The republic undertook a struggle with the clergy and has been beaten. As long as fortune smiled on the government and the home situation was good, so long the Republican party was victorious; but the moment that circumstances turned against us, the church easily got the upper hand again. We hav stirred up so formidable an enemy that two bad harvests were sufficient to render us incapable of coping with him. . . . The suppression of the catechism in the schools is the pivot on which the elections turned. The peasant of the Aveyron, while he may enjoy the customary jokes at the expense of the clergy, is at bottom religious. He believes in the church, fears the priest, and follows his advice. And ever since the erasure of the catechism from the list of studies of the primary schools, the priests of the Aveyron hav been preaching against 'the godless schools.' . . . Sermons, private conversations, visits to voters—they did not leave a stone unturned that would aid them in accomplishing their purpose." Here is a specimen extract from one of these sermons. The parish priest of Badassac exclaimed: "France is in utter disorder. Our holy religion is attacked on every side. The devil has left the bottomless pit. We must stand firm, my dear brethren." In certain villages the priest had his congregation recite, every evening, litanies that he had added these words to, and which the faithful repeated nineteen times: "Deliver us, O Lord, from godless schools; deliver us, O Lord, from unbelieving school-masters!"

The department of the Lozere borders on the one we hav just been considering, and here we find the religious question still more pronounced. At the elections of 1881 the Republicans had 23,600 votes and the Reactionaries only 1,530. Last October the result was as follows. Republicans, 15,000, Reactionaries, 16,600. The Republicans, therefore, lost 8,600 voters, who went over to the opposit party along with 8,000 others who had stayed at home in 1881. "It is the opinion of everybody that I hav consulted," says the writer in the Temps, "that this change is due to the exertions of the clergy. . . . The elimination of religious instruction from the primary schools, the fear that theological students may be forced into the army, and the perspectiv of the separation, in the near future, of church and state, determined the priesthood to enter the political arena and to defend their interests. . . . The Semaine Religieuse, the organ of the bishop of Mende, published, under the title of the 'Obligatoriness of Voting,' a sort of electoral catechism, which was issued in a special edition for the use of priests and the faithful. It is scarcely necessary to say that it was scattered far and wide in the mountainous districts by the Reactionary candidates."

Here are a few specimen questions and answers taken from this curious document:

"Should one feel obliged to vote?"

"Yes; and the obligation is all the more strict because the consequences of a wrong vote are very detrimental to religion and society."

"Is it a grave fault to vote wrong?"

"Dare you believe that it would not be a grave fault to vote wrong!"

"Is an elector bound to confess having voted wrong?"

"Certainly, because it is a grave fault; you should feel bound to confess it, repent of it, never do so again, and do all in your power to repair the lamentable consequences of it."

"It is said that priests hav no right to talk of elections in their pulpit. Is it true, and is it in conformity with Catholic doctrin?"

"The priests hav the right, and it is their duty to recommend that one vote according to one's conscience enlightened by religion, and for those candidates who promis to defend true principles, and not to support bad laws."

"What is voting right?"

"Ordinarily in elections, and especially in general elections, there are two parties in the field—conservativs and revolutionists, the party of order and the party of disorder, God's party and Satan's party. Now, there can be no hesitation as to which of these parties one should giv one's vote."

This campaign document appeared toward the middle of September, about a month before election-day. The priests took the hint and began forthwith a most vigorous attack on the existing order of things. In the Lozere, as in the Aveyron, the country pulpits hurled their anathemas at the legal government of the nation and at the institutions of 1789. Every church resounded with some such declaration as this: "Those who vote for the candidates of Satan will commit a moral sin, will be excommunicated and will go to hell." There were variations of this general theme, as, for instance, this questioning a child on the catechism: "'In whose image are you made?' asked the priest. 'In God's,' answered the child. 'No,' responded the priest; 'the Republican schoolteachers tell you that you are made in the image of a monkey; or if you don't understand that, in the image of a "mounine" [the patois for monkey], like those you see at the circus.'"

Another priest blesses the ballots of the reactionary candidates, and still another shouts from his pulpit on the very morning of election that he hopes that those who vote Satan's ticket may be struck by lightning. In some cases children are informed that if their fathers vote wrong—that is, for Republicans—they (the children) will not be allowed to join the church, and in other cases the wives of well-known Republicans are refused absolution. No wonder that a senator of this department wrote to a friend the day after election as follows: "I am utterly discouraged. I advised those who hav been attached to me for long years to vote the Republican ticket. But they refused to do so, saying, 'We do not want to lose our souls.'"

Once more it was shown that Roman Catholicism is all-powerful when arrayed against French republicanism, and never did Gambetta's cry sound truer: "Clericalism, that's the enemy!"

Toulouse, France.

THE main contest must be between the church of Rome on the one hand and Rationalism on the other. Protestantism is midway between the two, and must ultimately take sides with one or the other of the combatants.—D. M. Bennett.

How Christianity Was Engrafted upon the Common Law of England.

The idea of a great many Christians in this country is that Christianity is a part of the common law of the land. This notion has descended from the time of the Puritans, and a great many judges hav set the seal of official approval upon it. Several judges, also, hav repudiated this notion. But the notion is still prevalent, and often quoted. Daniel Webster claimed it when he unsuccessfully attempted to break the will of Stephen Girard—an attempt, by the way, that has since more effectually succeeded through Christian duplicity and dishonesty than was possible through any arts of the law. The Massachusetts legislators had no doubt that Christianity was a part of the common law when they passed the act against Atheism and blasphemy which the New Jersey legislators copied, and under which Charles B. Reynolds is now indicted and awaiting trial.

But all these folks will be surprised to learn that this notion is based on a gross fraud perpetrated centuries ago, and exposed in this country by no less a person than Thomas Jefferson. In his speech defending Abner Kneeland, at the January term of court, in Boston, in 1834, just fifty-three years before Mr. Reynolds will be tried, Andrew Dunlap, Mr. Kneeland's counsel, drew the attention of the court to the following letter from Thomas Jefferson to Major Cartwright, of England:

"I was glad to find in your book a formal contradiction at length, of the judiciary usurpation of legislativ powers; for such the judges hav usurped in their repeated decisions that Christianity is a part of the common law. The proof of the contrary which you hav adduced is incontrovertible, to wit, that the common law existed while the Anglo-Saxons were yet pagans, at a time when they had never yet heard the name of Christ pronounced, or knew that such a character had ever existed. But it may amuse you to show when and by what means they stole this law in upon us. In a case of quare impedit in the Year book, 34 H. 6, folio 38 (anno 1458), a question was made how far the ecclesiastical law was to be respected in a common law court. And Prisot, a chief justice, givs his opinion in these words: 'A tiel leis qu'ils de seint église ont en ancien scripture, convient à nous à donner crédence; car ceo common ley sur quels touts manners leis sont fondés. Et, auxy, Sir, nous sumus obligés de conustre lour ley de saint église; et semblablement ils sont obligés de conustre nostre ley. Et, Sir, si plit apperer or à nous que l'évesque ad fait come un ordinary fera en tiel cas, adong nous devons ceo adjuger bon, ou autrement nemy,' etc. See S. C. Fitzh. abr, Qu, imp. 89. Bro. Abr. Qu, imp. 12. Finch, in his first book, c. 3, is the first afterwards who quotes this case, and mistakes it thus: 'To such laws of the church as hav warrant in holy scripture, our law giveth credence.' And cites Prisot, mistranslating 'ancien scripture' into 'holy scripture.' Whereas Prisot palpably says, 'to such laws as those of holy church hav in ancient writing, it is proper for us to giv credence;' to wit, to their ancient written laws. This was in 1613, a century and a half after the dictum of Prisot. Wingate, in 1658, erects this false translation into a maxim of the common law, copying the words of Finch, but citing Prisot. Wing. Max. 3, and Sheppard, title, 'Religion,' in 1675, copies the same mistranslation, quoting the Y. B. Finch and Wingate. Hale expresses it in these words, 'Christianity is parcel of the laws of England.' 1 Ventr. 293, 3 Keb. 607. But he quotes no authority. By these echoings and reëchoings from one to another, it had become so established in 1728 that, in the case of the King vs. Woolston, 2 Stra. 834, the court would not suffer it to be debated whether to write against Christianity was punishable in the temporal court at common law. Wood, therefore, 409, ventures still to vary the phrase, and say that all blasphemy and profaneness are offenses by the common law, and cites 2 Stra. Then Blackstone, in 1763, IV. 59, repeats the words of Hale, that 'Christianity is a part of the laws of England,' citing Ventris and Strange. And, finally, Lord Mansfield, with a little qualification, in Evans's case, in 1767, says that 'the essential principles of revealed religion are part of the common law.' Thus engulphing Bible, Testament, and all into the common law, without citing any authority! And thus we find this chain of authorities hanging link by link, one upon another, all ultimately on one and the same hook, and that a mistranslation of the words, 'ancien scripture,' used by Prisot. Finch quotes Prisot; Wingate does the same. Sheppard quotes Prisot, Finch, and Wingate. Hale cites nobody. The court, in Woolston's case, cite Hale. Wood cites Woolston's case. Blackstone quotes Woolston's case and Hale. And Lord Mansfield, like Hale, ventures it on his own authority. Here I might defy the best read lawyer to produce another scrip of authority for this judiciary forgery, and I might go on further to show how some of the Anglo-Saxon priests interpolated into the text of Alfred's laws the 20th, 21st, 22d, and 23d chapters of Exodus, and the 15th of the Acts of the Apostles, from the 23d to the 29th verses. But this would lead my pen and your patience too far. What a conspiracy this between church and state! Sing Tantarara, rogues all, rogues all. Sing Tantarara, rogues all!"

It is undisputed that the common law of this country is derived from England. But the common law of England is older than Christianity. If the religion of England had always been part of the common law, then we should find incorporated in it all sorts and kinds of religion. In the earliest times of British history Druidism was prevalent. The Romans brought with them the gods of Rome. The Saxons brought the Saxon gods. When Christianity straggled into England, it was in the form of Catholicism. Afterward Protestantism was adopted. Then Catholicism again was supreme. Then Protestantism was the state religion. Presbyterianism was once dominant; then Puritanism; then came the Church of England. Either all or none of these were common law. Every lawyer knows that not Druidism, nor the mythology of Rome, nor the idolatry of the Saxons is regarded as common law, and the only authority for the claim that Christianity is a part of the common law Jefferson shows to be the decisions of several judges, all based on the mistranslation of a single word, quoted from one case to another. When the Massachusetts people adopted Matthew Hale's opinion on this subject, they adopted also his belief in witchcraft, and he was their great authority in sustaining the prosecutions for witchcraft which disgraced Massachusetts's early history. New Jersey, too, once had laws against witches, but they hav long since been repealed, and their reënactment forbidden. The last relic of these barbaric times when church and state were united is the blasphemy statute, which imprisons a man for twelve months who contumeliously reproaches the Christian religion.

Then and Now.

In the old times of the Inquisition, when Christianity ruled everything and everybody, the punishment of a heretic was attended to by the priests and their mercenaries with but little ceremony and no vacillation. Scores and hundreds of so-called Infidels were killed without the outside world's knowledge, but with its full privity and consent. Occasionally, however, the church would hold a festival for its children, the chief attraction of which was the burning of a score or so of heretics. To this the common people resorted gladly, laughing and rejoicing that the enemies of the church were to be punished. A Spanish auto-dâ-fê of the fifteenth century became the church festival of the nineteenth century.

We could not help thinking of this while at Morristown last week, when the case of Mr. Reynolds was in court. The state had subpœnaed about thirty witnesses to testify that Mr. Reynolds had exposed the Christian religion to contempt and ridicule by circulating in Boonton his pamphlet on "Blasphemy and the Bible." These witnesses filled one side of a car on the run between Boonton and Morristown, and overflowed to the other side, where sat the Boonton friends of Mr. Reynolds—Mr. Worman, Mr. Maxfield, and the sturdy Mrs. Booth and her large family of grown-up sons and daughters. Everyone in the car was going to attend the trial, and everyone thought that before night Mr. Reynolds would be in jail. A lawyer said, "If they call his case at 12:30, by 3 o'clock he will be sentenced." The Christians were sure they had their enemy on the hip, and that for some time to come he would cease disturbing the serenity of Boonton. Mr. Reynolds's friends were greatly depressed in spirit; they went to Morristown feeling about the same as the friends of the condemned heretics might feel upon witnessing the forming of the priestly procession for the auto-dâ-fê. The Christians went as to a festival—arrayed in their best, laughing, and happy—with anticipations of a pleasing spectacle. Their Bible was to be vindicated by the imprisonment of the man who ridiculed it, and why shouldn't they be happy? The animal and religious of their natures were in the ascendant, just as these traits were in the ascendant in the Catholics of Spain two or three centuries ago. They had no thought of the wife waiting for a word from her husband, of the children waiting to see their father. Their jollity was a shameful exhibition of the tiger still lurking in Christianity.

Blasphemy laws are the expression of this feeling of hate and revenge which Christians entertain toward unbelievers. It is the cruelty in human nature, intensified by the devoutness with which they worship. The dearer they hold their religion, the fiercer do they persecute those who oppose it. The only way to prevent such deeds of cruelty is to substitute in the people a love for men instead of a love for "God." If the Boonton Christians thought more of humanity than of their creeds, they would not hav been so jolly over the prospect of sending Mr Reynolds to prison.

Heresy! Heresy!

When Henry George began his campaign for the mayoralty of this city, among his stanchest supporters were a few Catholic priests, chief of whom was Edward McGlynn, of St. Stephen's church in East 28th street. Mr. McGlynn was a popular orator at Mr. George's meetings, and publicly announced his conversion to Mr. George's land theories. A few days before the election the priests, for some reason or other, quieted down, and it was publicly announced that the higher Catholic authorities had sat on them. Monsignor Ducey, one of the city's prelates, said that McGlynn's speeches had given such offense to the Catholic authorities that "he had been inhibited from making further political speeches." Monsignor Preston, vicar-general of the diocese, wrote as follows regarding Henry George's candidacy:

"I can state with confidence that the great majority of the Catholic clergy in this city are opposed to the candidacy of Mr. George. They think his principles unsound and unsafe, and contrary to the teachings of the church. I hav not met one among the priests of this archdiocese who would not deeply regret the election of Mr. George to any position of influence. His principles, logically carried out, would prove the ruin of the workingman he professes to befriend. Whatever may be said, I think there is no question as to the position of the Catholic clergy. And although we never interfere directly in elections, we would not wish now to be misunderstood at a time when the best interests of society may be in danger."

A World reporter called upon Mr. McGlynn to obtain from him the knowledge of how he regarded this manifesto of his priestly superior. Mr. McGlynn developed surprising symptoms of heresy, writing his sentiments down as follows:

"I think that if ecclesiastical authorities wished to giv to the public the impression or the information which your note tells me was conveyed in an interview in your paper yesterday, they would hav taken some other way of doing it. I therefore think proper to take no notice of that interview.

"As to your second question, whether the supposed action of ecclesiastical superiors implies that Mr. George's doctrins are disapproved of by the church, I hav to say that the only action of ecclesiastical superiors that is in evidence is a published letter of Monsignor Preston, which, for aught that appears, may hav been published without his consent. It is an answer to a letter of a personal friend. In any case these utterances of Monsignor Preston should hav just so much weight, and no more, as the readers may feel called upon to giv them—such opinion as they may hav of his capacity to observe facts, to state them accurately, and to pass judgment upon them wisely.

"I, for one, totally dissent from his statements of fact and from his expressed opinions. And I do not forget that ecclesiastics whose censure was of much greater weight than his, even if expressed in his official capacity, namely, the so-called 'Qualifiers' of the Roman Inquisition, condemned as heresy what their successors acknowledged to be no heresy, but a scientific truth, when they condemned the teaching of Galileo as heretical because expressly contrary to the holy scriptures.

"The letters of Galileo and the work of Copernicus, a Catholic priest, teaching the true solar system, were placed upon the index of forbidden books and kept there for a century, till they were removed from it by that enlightened pope, Benedict XIV."

Mr. McGlynn writes quite bravely in this interview, but, all the same, he has not made any more campaign speeches. Probably he will obey orders in that respect. What the church will do to him for recalling one of its most serious ancient errors remains to be seen. And, too, saying that his ecclesiastical superior's opinions are entitled to only the weight that anyone feels called upon to giv them —that is, of no more weight than those of any other well-read person with medieval leanings — this is heresy, flat and heinous!

The Reverend Dr. Edward McGlynn, of St. Stephen's, will do well to be careful. The serpent yet has fangs!

The Kansas Victims of Law.

On Tuesday, October 19th, Mr. E. C. Walker and his wife were denied a new trial, and sentenced by Judge Crosier to two and one-half months' and one and one-half months' imprisonment, respectivly. The sheriff and his deputy vigorously protested against having a woman sent to the jail, as there were no accommodations for her, and the judge allowed the sheriff to keep Mrs. Walker at his house until a cell could be cleaned and furnished. By this time, undoubtedly, she is in jail at Oskaloosa. The case will go to the Supreme Court of Kansas at once.

The position of the judge in this case is an anomalous one, and his action is very queer. He decided that Mr. Walker and Miss Harman are legally married, yet he shuts them up in jail, as though they were criminals. His action amounts to a declaration that people are not free to legally marry as they please, but must go through certain forms. If this is law, it certainly is not justice.

Mr. and Mrs. Walker are being vigorously defended, and if the Supreme Court follows the precedents of law they will be released. Eighteen states, Mr. Walker says, hav decided that marriages of the nature of his are valid. There is no reason why Kansas should fall out of line. The secular idea of marriage is that it is a partnership; the Christian idea is that it is a sacrament. If it is a simple partnership, the witnessing by law officers is no more essential to its legality than such witnessing is to any contract made by any two competent persons. The rightful purpose of the law is fulfilled in securing to the parties theirs and their children's rights in the matter of property and parental care. There is nothing at all sacred about marriage, and if Mr. and Mrs. Walker can help to get it out of the sacrilegious hands of power-seeking churchmen, and more fully establish its secular character, they will hav conferred a benefit upon the country.

One of the incidents of this affair is the desertion of Mr. Walker by his old friend, Tucker. Hitherto Mr. Walker and Mr. Tucker hav been mutual admirers of each other, nestling side by side on the elevated roost of philosophical Anarchism. Mr. Tucker now parts from Mr. Walker, sadly but firmly. Why? Because, in claiming that his marriage is legal, Mr. Walker submits to the state, and in so doing makes a dependant of himself and Mrs. Walker, and Mr. Tucker will never contribute "money for the vindication of the right of men and women to enslave themselvs." And Mr. Tucker adds, "All who contribute to the Lucifer defense fund will be doing just that and nothing less." It is painful to see these two eminent Anarchists disagreeing, but such is Anarchy! From the standpoint of their philosophy Mr. Tucker is right. If Mr. Walker and Miss Harman had been acting up to the principles of Anarchism, they would hav formed their union without saying anything to anybody, and without any ceremony whatever. In making their contract in the presence of third parties they were not only illogical, but abandoned the right to be considered Anarchists. Having abandoned that, they might, without further sacrifice of principle, hav gone before a justice of the peace. However, as their marriage is legal without the signature of a justice, they had the right to choose the simplest way. Moreover, Mr. Tucker was as illogical as they when he allowed their union to stand as Anarchistic, and proposed to defend it. But now that Mr. Tucker has forsaken Mr. Walker, the opponents of Anarchy will probably love the latter more for the enemy he has made. Mr. Tucker, we think, might hav waited till Mr. Walker was free before abandoning him. If adherence to Anarchy demands the severing of the friendship, a censorious world will say it would hav been less unkind to do it when the forsaken one did not need funds. Now the world will recall the fact that the Chicago Anarchists were left in the same way, and draw erroneous conclusions.

Theory and Practice.

It is a favorit theory with the Christians that prayer is of great utility. As a means of making known to God his own glory and perfections; as a means of informing him how he should conduct the world; as a means of impressing him with an adequate idea of the greatness of his ministers and the general unworthiness of all who do not fall down and support them; and as the most direct method to bring alleged divinity to the level of his creatures, prayer has been found particularly efficacious. It is held, too, by a great many good Christians, that prayer is always answered, either directly or indirectly, or not at all. They believe implicitly in prayer, and consider it a good thing—in fact, the best thing in the world.

The Rev. A. B. Simpson is perhaps as honest in his belief in prayer as any Christian in this city. Christ said that if one possessed faith he could pray mountains aside. Mr. Simpson believes Christ spoke the truth, though he has never moved mountains. But so confident is he that prayer is answered that he has started an institution at 329 East Fiftieth street, this city, known as the Berachah Orphanage. He has gathered therein ten orphans, and so reliant upon prayer is the Rev. Mr. Simpson that he has these orphans depend upon prayer for their daily subsistence, and also upon prayer instead of upon doctors in sickness. Mr. Simpson himself is a faith cure practitioner.

Now comes Superintendent Jenkins, of Mr. Gerry's Society for the Protection of Children, and hales Mr. Simpson before the courts, as Mr. Cowley of the Shepherd's Fold was haled. Why Mr. Jenkins interfered in the matter he told a reporter: "This society does not believe in faith institutions, particularly for children. I don't charge Mr. Simpson with anything criminal. My course was dictated by a belief that reliance upon faith may lead to neglect of the children, especially in sickness."

Alas for the faith! Mr. Jenkins is a Christian, but he evidently does not believe in prayer. When addressing Sunday-schools he tells the children to pray, but when anyone attempts to liv by prayer he would use the strong arm of the law to force down his throat the prosaic potato and commonplace bread and butter. Christian theory and practice seem greatly at variance.

Editorial Notes.

OUR readers will be glad to know that Colonel Ingersoll was none the worse for his trip through the rain to Morristown to save Mr. Reynolds from a county jail, and that his throat is doing well and is likely in a short time to be as good as ever. Considering the risk he ran of a cold that might hav permanently disabled his vocal organs, Mr. Ingersoll's efforts for Mr. Reynolds partook of the nature of a self-sacrifice—a sort of voluntary immolation on the legal altar of Christian bigotry. Such magnificent generosity is characteristic of the man, and, with the thousand or so of other good traits, makes him loved by all who know him, and by a few millions who hav not that privilege.

THE Kansas City Organizer, a labor journal, is responsible authority for the following: "A few days ago an eminent divine of this city rode out to the end of the cable line, where a great many are laborers at work, for the purpose of raising funds for a church building. Instead of going to the men himself, telling them his mission and thankfully receiving what each could afford to giv, he induced the contractor, the employer of the men, to go with him. Together they filched from the poverty-stricken laborers one dollar each by terrorizing them with the fear that unless they each gave that amount they would lose their job. One poor man with a family offered twenty-five cents, but the priest, accompanied by him upon whom the poor man was depending for a living, said that they took nothing less than a dollar. Most of the men gave their consent, and Saturday night the money was taken from their wages by the religious boss. One poor man who had been out of work for several months, and who is in destitute circumstances, refused to make a donation and received a scowl from the boss and was discharged the next day."

THE clerks and salesmen of this city held a mass-meeting last week to influence public opinion in favor of early closing, Saturday half holidays, and a total abolition of Sunday traffic. The affair was practically a campaign meeting for Henry George. The principal orators were two clergymen—a Catholic and a Protestant. Sandwiched between them was James Redpath, manager of the North American Review, and a Freethinker. He made the best speech of the evening, although consideration for the feelings of the churchmen, and an over-anxious desire not to hurt, by any expression of Infidelity, Mr. George's chances of election, rendered Mr. Redpath extremely inaccurate in one historical statement. Bowing low to Dr. McGlynn he avowed, "If it had not been for the church we should not hav had any Sunday." This is an utterly false assertion, for the Hindoos, Chinese, Persians, Assyrians, and Egyptians all hav their septenary day of rest, and had it, too, before the apostolic tramps were heard of, and before Constantine joined the church. They had it contemporary with the Jewish Sabbath; they had it when God's chosen people were slaves in Egypt; and in China, so far as the historians know, a seventh day of rest was observed before the creation is said to hav occurred. Mr. Redpath knows this well enough, but probably the presence of such distinguished clergymen upon the platform, and the desire for Mr. George's election, frightened the knowledge away. Rabbi E. B. M. Browne, who had accepted an invitation to speak at this meeting, sent a letter of regret that he could not fill the engagement. He closed with these words: "Liberty without religion is a logical contradiction. Religion without a Sabbath is logical nonentity. Agnosticism, Atheism, and Anarchy are only three different names of the same monster, in its various stages of development, threatening the very life of the republic. The Sabbath alone can save our Union. Let the workingman's powerful arm wield the Sabbath weapon to crush Anarchy's skull. This is a religious country!" John Swinton, who presided, had too much common sense to read Rabbi Browne's letter.

WE noted last week the employment by the Independent of a force of women compositors who were compelled to labor nearly all one night without extra remuneration. By a letter in the London Press News we judge this unfair treatment of printers to be a common failing of the religious press. The writer asks: "Can you explain the query, Why do religious bodies, as a rule, pay such poor prices for their printing? I hav on my books five representativs of religion, and although they all strongly object to nasty work, cheapness is an indispensable essential to doing business with them. I know this is a mania with which we are all more or less afflicted, and the low figure generally secures the order; but, for downright starvation prices, my experience has brought me in contact with no tradesman who can be compared to religious folk. 'How much do you charge for a hundred bills about this size?' (demy-folio) I was lately asked by a clergyman who wanted some done 'at once.' 'About 5s. or 6s.; it depends on the matter to be set up.' 'So much as that! I never paid more than 3s. 6d. when I was in Bermondsey!' And a similar wail do I hav to hear with larger orders from the same class of customers. I do not know if other printers hav a like unpleasant experience, but certainly it is my lot to deal with religious people who hav desperately narrow views of the laborer being worthy of his hire." An American journal takes this letter up and adds another count to the indictment: "It is a fact that admits of no denial that a majority of religious periodicals are printed in unfair shops, and that as a rule printing for churches or church sociables, concerts, lectures, etc., is of an unprofitable character. Why compositors employed on Sunday-school magazines or denominational journals should receive less wages than those employed on secular publications is a conundrum we should like to hav satisfactorily explained. The Bible teaches that the laborer is worthy of his hire. We are not referring to country publications, or the struggling parish minister, but to religious publications, official and representativ in their character, organs of the more wealthy denominations published in our larger cities. We like to see practice and preaching correspond."

Lectures and Meetings.

W. S. BELL writes us that he has all the work he can attend to in Texas until December, when he goes to Kansas.

J. E. REMSBURG, the Liberal speaker, addressed the people at Preston's Opera House, Thursday, October 14th. Mr. Remsburg is a pleasing speaker, and held the attention of the large audience for over an hour. Sometimes, during the address, the house was stilled to absolute quiet. He gave a brief review of the life of Thomas Paine, and his connection with and part in the formation of our government. . . . . Altogether, it was an earnest and eloquent appeal for justice to the memory of one of the greatest statesmen and patriots of the the Revolutionary period.—Grinnell, Ia., Independent.

THE Republican Press of Millsville, Wis., dated October 21st, writes thus of Mr. Charles Watts's recent lectures in that city: "The Liberal lectures given at the theater on Saturday and Sunday by Mr. Charles Watts were largely attended, and gave great satisfaction to the hearers. Mr. Watts, besides being a very eloquent speaker, is a logical one, and his lectures are bristling all over with good points which appeal to the reason of his hearers instead of their prejudices. He does not resort to abuse in his lectures, but he says some sharp things which no man can successfully dispute, so far as heard from."

W. F. JAMIESON'S engagements are as follows: Wickes, Mont., Nov. 3d, 4th, and 5th; Dillon, Nov. 7th, 8th, and 9th; Denver, Col., Nov. 14th; Greeley, Nov. 17th, 18th, and 19th. Colorado Liberals desiring lectures will address him at Denver, care of Charles Roth, 271 Fifteenth street. Of his effort in Bozeman, Mont., the Daily Courier of that place says: "The lecturer has a very pleasant and fluent address, and the deep interest with which he waded into his subject appeared to take hold of his audience." The Chronicle, of the same place, said: "Mr. Jamieson delivered the first of a series of lectures Tuesday evening. He is a splendid speaker, and has a national reputation as a Liberal lecturer."

Letters from Friends.

GRINNELL, IA., Oct. 23, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: J. E. Remsburg was at this place, and delivered his lecture, "The Apostle of Liberty." He had a large audience, and the most of the people seemed attentiv. One Christian walked out before the lecture was over, and pulled his hat down over his eyes, as he went, as though ashamed of being there at all. MINNIE B. LEINS.

AXTELL, KAN., Oct. 3, 1866.

MR. EDITOR: The orthodox clergy are endeavoring to convince the people that Liberals are Anarchists, but if our Liberal journals take the right course they will fail. Liberalism in this vicinity is fifty per cent stronger than five years ago, and if Liberal literature could be scattered broadcast among the people all over the land, the clergy would soon be earning their labor by honest labor. J. E. C.

SALESVILLE, M. T., Oct. 9, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Since some of your correspondents are engaged in cracking the nut whether wheat will pass to chess, I want to pass one in and hav it cracked among the rest.

A few years since there was a patch of volunteer winter wheat on my ranch. After it had jointed, some cattle got into the field and grazed on the patch. As a natural consequence, some stools were left untouched, others entirely eaten off, while others were partly eaten. Those untouched grew up wheat; those eaten off sprouted again from the stool, and came up chess; those half eaten came partly wheat and partly chess from the same stool.

THOMAS BURK.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Oct. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: In "Letters from Friends," J. H. Paine givs a deserved tribute to Mr. Hacker and his Pleasure Boat, as well as to his work of to-day; and yet just now Hacker and his aged wife are suffering for food, clothes, and all the needs of a comfortable life, and even thinking of laying down the lives that are seeming to be only a tax and a burden to themselvs and to the community. They gave all when youth, health, and strength were theirs, and now, when old, crippled, sick, and in poverty, the world passes by on the other side. Friends who feel for the needy will please address him, with inclosures as they are able and willing, Jeremiah Hacker, Berlin, Camden Co., N. J. ELMINA.

MINIER, ILL., Oct. 18, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: It appears to me but just that all liberal-minded men should help turn the great wheel of free thought and speech (so long as it does not interfere with the rights of others). Inclosed find post-office money-order for $13.50. For defense of Mr. C. B. Reynolds against the good Christians of New Jersey: Frank Williams, $1; John F. Quigg, $1; James F. Quigg, $1; B. T. Briggs, $1; Philip Imig, $1; Wm. J. Nicolay, 50 cents; J. M. Laudett, 50 cents; Jont Hammond, 50; J. Schaaf, $2; also $5 for two subscriptions for THE TRUTH SEEKER—Shed. Tanner and Lewis Pleines. I hope to be able to send in the names of more new subscribers soon. I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER about six months; hav but one fault to find, that is, it is giving us a little too much on Anarchy, I think, detrimental to the cause of liberty. Yours respectfully, J. SCHAAF.

ALLISTON, ONT., Oct. 12, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for another year.

Although not indorsing some of the illustrations, I would not like to miss some of the able articles within your pages. Such pictures as kissing the pope's foot I think extremely foolish, and bound to hav a bad effect on our noble cause. Not but that the Catholics are servil enough, but I hold if they cannot be reasoned out of their belief they will not be ridiculed out of it. And there is nothing will stop a Catholic quicker from reading THE TRUTH SEEKER than a look at that picture. They may increase the circulation amongst a certain class, but I think we will find a safer class of converts in the churches than the heedless, thoughtless crowd who are tickled with the caricatures. However, you run the paper and not me; all the same you are welcome to my opinion.

Yours fraternally, JOSEPH ELLIS.

LINDSAY, ONT., Oct. 12, 286.

MR. EDITOR: A converted Catholic, who is now a truth seeker Secularist, a gentleman who is not too bigoted to keep himself posted in Catholic literature, has requested me to forward to you the inclosed copy of Priest Lambert's reply to Mr. Reynolds's kind invitation to attend the recent Freethinker's convention, and to there giv his reasons, if he had any, for the faith he advocates, in accordance with 1 Peter iii, xv. With characteristic Christian bravery, the priest falls back to the rear and "lashes the Freethinker," as well as his friends, with a slanderous two-column newspaper excuse for not meeting his opponents, even though assured of fair treatment and an attentiv hearing, which, in the light of recent events in religious New Jersey, is considerably better than the deeds there done by the servants of the so-styled Prince of Peace. Mr. Lambert was evidently fearing the application of the old-time orthodox torture argument to help convince him of the errors of his faith, fiction, and preverted idealism.

The ignorance displayed by the priest of Waterloo of the objects and aims of Secularists is most astonishing, and if the majority of Christian ministers are no better informed, it is no wonder that their deluded hearers are full of prejudice and bigotry toward those of their fellow-countrymen who dare to be Freethinkers, those whom the truths of nature, aided by science and experience, hav made free—free from the shackles of priestcraft and man-made creeds founded on the horrible Bible fables that are yet too often instilled into the children, even before a knowledge of right and wrong can get a chance to dawn on their infantile minds.

The slurs and false insinuations which this priest seems to delight to heap upon his opponents, especially his questionable statements in regard to the religious reaction that culminated in the excesses of the French revolution, could be ably met by our noble historian, James Parton, Esq., whose masterly works apparently form no portion of the library of the cowardly priest of Waterloo. FAIR PLAY.

NEW YORK, Oct. 16, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $1, and continue my paper until the close of the year.

As there is a diversity of opinion in regard to your illustrations, I will offer mine. I think they are immense. They are silent sermons. At the first view some of them seem ridiculous, but upon a close study it dawns upon you in all its beauty like a stereoscopic view. I look as anxiously for my paper as I would for an expected letter. Of course, I cannot indorse everything that is published in it; still, I hav charity enough to tolerate the most diverse views; and by publishing different opinions you show your liberality. In regard to the Anarchists' trial and conviction in Chicago I heartily agree with you. I do not sympathize with the cause, but still I claim that those men should hav a fair, impartial trial. Then, if justice says they are guilty, let them suffer; but their guilt has not been proven yet.

J. W. CHISM.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., Oct. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: After Mr. Watts finished his recent successful course of lectures at Grand Rapids, we invited him here. He gave an eloquent address at the Opera House before a good-sized audience; subject, "The Superstitious Teachings of the Bible." Fred Hotop, proprietor of the American House, the finest and largest hotel in the city, entertained Mr. Watts while here in grand style. He attended the lecture with his whole family. He is a German, a city official, and a prominent, public-spirited man. He said to me: "Hav Mr. Watts come right here every time. I want to encourage such men."

Fuller and Son, liverymen, sent out an elegant conveyance to show Mr. Watts over the city. Messrs. Gault, Kauffer, Sheriff Galligan, Bragg, Stearns, Haurer, judge, and many others took an activ part in making the lecture and Mr. Watts's visit here a success.

Mr. Watts is here again on his return from the West. He lectures to-night before the Knights of Labor upon "Gladstone and the Home Rule."

To-morrow we go to Hastings, where, through the assistance of Charles H. Bauer, a prominent lawyer and citizen of that place, I hav arranged for five lectures. No doubt Mr. Bauer will send you a report of the lectures from there.

LUCIUS C. WEST.

OSHKOSH, WIS., Oct. 15, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Some months ago, I attended the funeral services of the Rev. Mr. Jones, of the Methodist church, who died wealthy. Rev. Mr. Wilcox, of the first Methodist church, preached the sermon, and I had to smile a smole when he said that all successful preachers were called by God to preach the gospel. I suppose he meant all who got rich. The local papers hav never told us how much he was worth, but simply said he had left his family well fixed. But it is well known here that he died wealthy. Now, as it is not easy for a rich man to get to heaven by the old route, I think he must hav gone cross lots, if he ever gets there. I believe all the Liberal lecturers are afraid of this place, as they never come here, and I don't know as I can blame them much, for this is the fountain head of superstition in the whole West. I hav been trying for the last three months to convert a Catholic lady, a neighbor of mine, and hav got her almost done. She has become very much interested in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and is reading all my Liberal books. I also hav a number of others on the anxious seat. I am working very quietly but very effectually. My TRUTH SEEKER comes regularly, and is the most welcome visitor at my house. There is a church scandal on the tapis here, but I will wait further developments before I say anything about it. GEO. M. HARE.

NEWARK, N. J., Oct. 10, 286.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to know if it is possible to get the Anarchist reply to the judge. If so, would you please publish in your next number of THE TRUTH SEEKER? [The complete speeches of the Anarchists before Judge Gary are published in pamphlet form. They would fill two issues of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Publishing them is therefore out of the question. The pamphlet can undoubtedly be obtained of the Labor Press Association, 76 and 78 Fifth avenue, Chicago, Ill., for about 25 cents.—ED. T. S.] I hav read their trial, and fail so see any evidence that would justify the sentence. Those men's lives hav been sworn away and convicted by a spy. That is not reliable evidence in a court of justice, but I suppose it is good enough for a political court. You know that all our judges in this free country of ours are politicians. You know that they are all honest. You also know they are above suspicion of doing any wrong to their fellowman. You know their decisions are always in favor of the salt of this earth, the poor man, and against the rich. In fact, they are god-fearing men, not worldly; they are true Christians; they are so religious after they condemn a poor plebeian to be choked to death they wind up in a sanctimonious whine, "And may God hav mercy on your soul." They will tell the innocent man, "It is not I that punish you, it is the voice of the public that demands your blood." And whom do they mean by the public?—a lot of idle politicians who are barnacles on the society taxed to support them; and after they become superannuated they must be retired on a pension at the expense of the laboring man. If the poor dare raise their voice to protest, they are clubbed and thrown in prison, and tried, convicted, and sentenced to be hanged. And this is the voice of public opinion! The voice of the devil, better say, and ignorance and stupidity.

Talking of the devil, I hav been told for a fact by a Christian named Mr. Eagen, a grocery man in Brunswick, that the devil appeared in Jersey. I inquired where, and he answered, "Outside of the city. There were men making sport of the Lord's supper, and Old Nick, with his fork, shovel, horns, and cloven foot, appeared in front of them on the ceiling." I told him that would hav been a good time to make a prisoner of Old Nick. I suppose they were drunk, and had the bug on them. I bade this man of intelligence good-bye, and remarked that the devil always appeared to Christians. He inquired if I did not believe in a devil. I answered, "Yes, two-legged Christian devils." He called to his child, Mary Ann, to come in the house.

SOUTH OTSELIC, N. Y., Oct. 19, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: It is with a bitter sense of humiliation that I hav to enroll myself again among the list of delinquents, but when I tell you that a disastrous fire by lightning on the 18th of July swept me out of $500 in less than two hours, and with no insurance to back me up, you will understand why I hav been too short of funds to spare even the small sum due the dear TRUTH SEEKER. Every hour of my life I regret that I hav not the means yet at my command to help carry on this warfare for liberty of tongue and pen.

The case of C. B. Reynolds, in Boonton, N. J.; the insulting treatment of the intelligent Hindoo at Asbury Park; the case of those unjustly condemned labor reformers, or so-called Anarchists, of Chicago, ought to inspire renewed zeal in every man and woman to stand firmly for the little liberty we already hav; for these aggressiv maneuvers on the part of the officers of religion in combination with our government officials, so well defended as they are by the public press, all point to an early crisis between liberty and mental and moral slavery. I wish those two foreign gentlemen, Joshee and Sattay, could be induced to come out into the country and deliver a course of lectures on the condition and customs of the people of their country. It might take some of the enthusiasm out of people who are so engaged in the foreign mission hobby.

THE TRUTH SEEKER was never better than to-day. The cartoons speak volumes. Our children notice them, and want me each week to explain to them what they mean. In this way they hav already become interested in THE TRUTH SEEKER. MRS. MARY PECK.

ITHACA, Oct. 28, 286.

MR. EDITOR: I continue my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER from November 7, 1886, onward, by sending you $1, claiming a respectful right to its columns as a Freethinker. I plead nature, and nature's embodiment in man's structure as it stands this moment, and fully embrace all the good and evil of the Bible, of Christian theology, of liberal sectarianism, of freeloveism, of Spiritualism, and of every other ism under the sun as all belonging to nature in man. It is knowledge we want to harmonize and utilize the great variety of nature's members. This embodiment of nature called man must not be maimed in any of its members, but as evolution has advanced knowledge, charity takes the place of bigotry, and each member, whether honorable or dishonorable, performs its rightful office in the body, and is an important help in all its movements. It must not be forgotten that nature, in all her variety, is positiv and negativ, and that it is knowledge with charity that only can equalize these opposits. We may fight and denounce what we call evil in others till doomsday, and we only beget the same uncharitable spirit in our opponent, and the opposits of nature will remain the same. But a quiet spirit and soft words may modify and smooth the rough edges on either side. Good and evil are a necessity, and can be obviated only by accepting it as such, and the twain are a unit at once. No mutual love can be attained between the sexes in the absence of nature's opposits. There must be in a true love match, a positiv and negativ organism, to stand the test of life's uneven path. I say again that my plea is nature and her embodiment in man's structure, and outside of that structure there is no possible knowledge, and that structure (a male and female unit) covers all the possible isms in existence, whether supposed to be good or evil. And why? Because good and evil are married together, an inseparable unit, by the great priest Experience. No use to denounce these creeping things, isms; they belong to the body and always will by the slight modifications of unity. I am happy to understand that our Virgin Mary (Freethought) is being overshadowed by the Holy Ghost (cartoons). ZENAS KENT.

MILWAUKEE, OR., Oct. 2, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I am not a subscriber to your paper, but I expect to be soon. Mr. Cressey, one of your subscribers, loaned me several copies to read. Mr. Editor, are not those pictures just "horrid?" Mr. Gill seems to think they hurt the feelings of his Christian friends. What a pity! Poor innocents. It's too bad to hurt their feelings. I wonder if those New Jersey Christians are aware that they are hurting the feelings of Mr. Reynolds and his friends. I, for one, would like to see those pictures on every page. I would take great pleasure in showing them to my Christian friends, especially to the preachers and pious deacons, for we do hav a few of these "critters" out here—more's the pity. I don't think much of an Infidel that is ashamed to show his colors, or afraid he might hurt the tender feelings of some of these meek and humble followers of the crucified lamb. Do they consider Mr. Reynolds their enemy? Their Jesus said, "Love your enemies." Are they following his advice in thus persecuting Mr. Reynolds? About those pictures—I don't see why any genuin Infidel can object to them. Even the high-priced editions of the Christian's Bible contain hundreds of pictures, and they are there to the more easily dupe the credulous. Their Jesus is pictured as very handsome, with long, flowing, curling locks, and faultless profile. But does this agree with his description as given in the Bible? In one place it says: "If a man hath long hair doth he not know it is a sin [disgrace] unto him;" and again, "His face was more marred than that of any man; more than the sons of man." Tell Mr. Heston to giv us "John preaching in the wilderness;" with a chunk of honeycomb in one hand, a locust in the other, and his audienee a lot of birds, chipmunks, squirrels, etc. Well, as this is my first letter for THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will close, and if this finds a place in its columns I may write again.

An Infidel now and forever, ALEX. C. WALLACE.

WELLAND, ONT., Oct. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 9th an article headed, "Picked up by Mr. Renwick." I hav no wish to enter upon a discussion of the subject of Anarchism. My friend Renwick has undertaken to pick me up before I got down. I had neither flopped over nor complained of too much backbone. My letter to the editor was not intended for publication. But he thought proper to print it, and I was glad he did, as his answer to it placed him before the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER in a light not to be misunderstood—not as an advocate of Anarchism, but an advocate of justice to Anarchists and all others, which was satisfactory to me, and I wrote him to that effect.

I am not an Anarchist, neither would I like to hav a person hung whose fortune or misfortune it was to be one. I think Mr. Renwick's satirical reply was uncalled for, as the editor to whom my letter was addressed had answered it in full. JOHN RAY.

WATERTOWN, N. Y., Oct. 22, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I see by a press dispatch from Dover, N. J., that C. B. Reynolds has been indicted by the grand jury for the imaginary crime of blasphemy, a crime that exists only in the diseased mind of a religious fanatic. In the face of advancing science, in defiance of the grand principles so clearly set forth in the Constitution of the United States, the bloodstained banner of the cross, the black flag of Christianity, triumphantly waves over the prostrate form of free speech in the priest-ridden and bigoted state of New Jersey. History repeats itself in this case, and the old-time Inquisition has been revived. These Christians of New Jersey, these meek and lowly followers of the lamb, these people who love their enemies, who when smitten on one cheek turn the other, hav, by their wretched work, shown only too clearly that the hellish spirit of the Inquisition still slumbers in their withered and heartless breasts. Please excuse my warmth of expression, for in a case like this I find it extremely difficult to preserve perfect serenity. Inclosed you will find $1 to assist Mr. Reynolds in defending himself against the enforcers of "Christian" morality.

ASHLEY, O., Oct. 14, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The books I ordered came to hand promptly, and are being distributed to good advantage, I hope. I don't choose to worry your patience, but I can't refrain from making a few remarks which, if good enough, you may publish. About six years ago I believed in the Christian's heaven and hell, but, thanks to THE TRUTH SEEKER, which was handed to me at that time to read by a friend, I had my eyes opened to the greatest fraud that was ever palmed off on an enlightened people. Why people reverence the old Jew book, with its profanity, obscenity, persecutions, and superstitious ideas, is more than I can imagin. The cause, probably, is from early education, but if we stop to think and reason with ourselvs, then we can see enough every day of our lives to teach us the Bible is a big fraud. I would not giv a good almanac for it, and I would not giv one school-house where the sciences are taught for all the churches in the land, and I verily believe that half the preachers to-day don't believe what they preach. We hav a young Methodist Episcopal preacher that comes here every two weeks to preach. He has studied the sciences, and is about to graduate at the Ohio Wesleyan University at Delaware, O., and can't believe what he preaches, for he knows better. Last winter we had a young squirt to preach here who made the remark during a revival that Bob Ingersoll rehashed Tom Paine and Voltaire. The little fool—either of those great men could forget more in one day than he could learn in a lifetime! This same upstart was conducting a revival a few miles south of here last winter also. A poor family near there, members of his church, sold chickens to the amount of two dollars and fifty cents. The wife gave this hypocrit two dollars of it, and the fifty cents for the heathen in foreign lands; and this robber is looked up to as a great and shining light in the Methodist church. He is more fit to occupy a cell in the penitentiary. The Lord loves a cheerful giver. I receive THE TRUTH SEEKER every Saturday, and you can bet I am fixed for Sunday reading. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER and Watson Heston. The pictures are great lessons, and Brother Heston knows just where to make his mark. CHARLES F. OLMSTED.

MYRTLE CREEK, OR., Oct. 20, 286.

MR. EDITOR: After having investigated the theory of Substantialism, as set forth in "The Problem of Human Life," by A. Wilford Hall, of New York, and also by the same author and others in the Microcosm and Scientific Arena, entitled scientifico-religious journals, I find that their religion does not blend with science. To be consistent they must treat each separately.

They cannot confound Bible theology with Substantialism. So far as they hav treated with Substantialism, they hav ignored the Bible. Until recently theologians hav fought science to the bitter end. Since the sixth century they hav put to death over fifty millions of people for the crime of heresy—for Freethought, mental liberty, and human rights. Yet, strange to say, they claim all the honor and ascribe to the church all of the glory and advancement that has been achieved by science.

Since this party has taken up the theory of Substantialism (which is a modified form of Pantheism) they hav attempted to overthrow Darwinism and the survival of the fittest, but so far hav only corroborated it, and while they hav been holding up to the people an invisible, Substantial God, they hav simply held up the molecular theory advanced by Democritus 400 B.C, together with the nebular hypothesis, force, motion, etc. To sum the whole hypothesis up, their God is reduced to the universe, with the laws that govern it, electricity in all of its phases being the ruling power. Now, they must go beyond all science, so far as is known, to find the God they claim and which they seem to ignorantly worship or else leave science and take the Bible alone as the limit to science and revelation, because they cannot hold to both at the same time. While we accept all that is true in science and theology, and nothing more, they claim that all of the Bible is divine inspiration. On the negativ, we claim that whatever conflicts with science cannot be of divine inspiration.

They treat elaborately upon the future state of mentality, acknowledging at the same time that all animate beings are endued with more or less intellectuality, such as thought, memory, etc., but their individuality, mentality, etc., will be reverted to their primitiv sources, but not so with mankind; that the intellectuality of man must continue as a special entity and individuality, and all who do not accept their creed must suffer the eternal condemnation and vengeance of an offended and avenging God.

But we claim that they do not know anything about that. We believe that if we make the best of this life, we shall be the better prepared to enter the next when it comes. We infer that a man must begin where he left off here—that if he has been sinning all his life on credit it will take him a long time to pay the debt with interest in the next world.

L. C. HILL.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., Oct. 18, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The inclosed article from the Daily Times will probably interest some of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It will show our friends all over this continent that we here in this city are by no means backward in promulgating Liberal thoughts and ideas. We hav some very good speakers here, and our meetings create a general interest among the thinking people. With such men as our president, John James, Judge Beasly, Dr. Lober, Dr. Palmer, Messrs. Goodwin and Bathman, and others, we cannot fail to arouse many from their lethargy, and raise them up to the standard of a great and noble manhood. The Times says:

It would, perhaps, startle our clergy to become fully acquainted with the rapid development of Liberalism (the new name for Infidelity) in this city. There is one club now in existence which numbers eighty activ, vigorous, and energetic members. The membership consists largely of ladies, and is said to embrace some of our leading business and professional men.

An activ member of the club, in speaking of the growth of Infidelity, said to a Times reporter: "The eighty members of our club is but a very small fraction of our sect in this city. I hav made a careful investigation and I believe I do not exaggerate when I say there are, to-day, fully two thousand persons in this city who believe as we do."

"Do you encourage Communism?"

"I am astonished at such a question. We believe in the rights of man, and believe that individual rights should be protected. No one was happier than I when the bloody Chicago Anarchists were condemned to death, and anyone who preaches such doctrins should be as summarily dealt with. No, sir! We believe in law, in justice, in humanity, and in human rights. We believe that everyone's religion should be respected, and no one has more veneration for the institutions of the orthodox than we, yet we claim the privilege of believing according to the dictates of our own conscience."

By an examination of your railroad map you will notice that Chattanooga is one of the great centers of the South. Our surroundings are indeed magnificent. On the south we hav the great Lookout Mountain with its warlike memories, on the east Mission Ridge and the national cemetery. Chattanooga is also the manufacturing and shipping point of the iron industries of Tennessee. And, oh, horror of horrors! it is the headquarters of the Salvation Army of the South, from whence it is going to fight the devil throughout all this region. It is a pity that men fall so low that they thus spend their time and education, which they could really use to a better advantage than in praying to an omnipotent God, by teaching school and giving their time to the education of our children, which would be more beneficial than all the shouting to the lamb. MAX LOTH, Sec. Liberal Club.

GRATTAN, MICH., Oct. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: It is not my object in writing this to argue this question of Anarchy, or endeavor to prove the rights or wrongs of Anarchists. My principal object is to ask you and your correspondents if there has not been about enough said on this subject for you to giv our Liberal friends to understand that it is time to call a halt, and devote the valuable space that it has recently occupied to subjects that will hav a greater tendency to unite all Liberals in promoting and advocating principles that will hav a greater tendency to draw to our support those who are looking on, hesitating, and wondering if we advocate that which will be productiv of more and greater good.

In the last number of your paper (Oct. 16th) about five columns were devoted to this subject, and so far as I am able to judge, comparativly little was said to prove the rights or wrongs pertaining to this question, or to enlighten the readers of your paper in regard to the objects and aims of Anarchists. All seem anxious to hav it understood that they are not in sympathy with the principles advocated by Anarchists, but are merely defending the right of free speech. We should all endeavor to sustain this right as sacred and inviolate, but I am at a loss to know why so much interest and apparent sympathy is displayed for an organization that seems to hav for its sole object the destruction of all government. Webster defines Anarchy to be: "Want of government; the state of society where there is no law or supreme power, or where the laws are not efficient, and individuals do what they please with impunity." Without expressing any opinion in regard to the justice or injustice of the condemnation of the Anarchists at Chicago (I leave that with the proper authorities), I will say that they are among the most notorious of that class, principally foreigners, and mostly aliens, who are the head center from which emanates the greatest amount of the labor troubles that hav afflicted our nation during the past year. They are the instigators, leaders, and abettors of a policy that has for its object the overthrow of all governments and laws in an illegal and violent manner. While the editor and a majority of the contributors on this subject profess opposition to the principles of the Anarchists, they hav little to say that tends to show their readers the horrible injustice and revolutionary tendency that permeates all the sayings and doings of the organization that they, in one sentence, profess to abhor; and in the same article the casual reader can hardly help noticing expressions of sympathy which, whether really intended as such or not, look like little "straws that show which way the wind blows."

I believe that in calling for a truce in the discussion of this question I am doing that which is called for, in view of the best interests of the cause of Secular Freethought, and the influence and success of THE TRUTH SEEKER as a conservator of justice, law, and order. CONVERSE CLOSE.

DES MOINES, IOWA, Oct. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Under the head of Cleveland, O., Sept. 5, 1886, I read a communication in THE TRUTH SEEKER from Brother Charles L. Watson. He appears to criticise some one calling himself "Justice," who had written an article headed "Powderly and Communism." He says for ignorance and misrepresentation it beats anything he had ever seen. I hav read both "Justice's" and Watson's, and will hav to say that it reminds me of Satan rebuking sin. "Justice" tries to hitch the Knights of Labor on to Communism, intimidation, forcible possession, and murder, which, without doubt, proves the ignorance of "Justice," and I am satisfied that he misrepresented the members of the Knights of Labor, and does them great injustice. Thus far and no farther I go with Brother Watson, but we can't subscribe to his defense of Powderly and his abuse of Martin Irons. To be plain, my brother has not been a close observer, or he is willingly making false statements and unbrotherly charges against Irons. He calls him a traitor, who had to flee from the Knights of Labor, and says he was hired by capitalists to ruin the order. Now, this is the first time, and Watson is the first, and, I believe, the only, man that ever made such unbrotherly charges against Irons. Whilst Irons was engaged in that terrible and unequal conflict with Jay Gould every true Knight of Labor in America was in sympathy with Irons and his men, and if he had had the pretended support of Powderly, which he, Powderly, pretended to giv him, Irons and his men would hav gained the recognition and victory over the Southwestern division of Jay Gould's railroad. We who watched that struggle all know well that Powderly sanctioned and encouraged Irons. We Knights in this section do not believe in strikes, but when Irons got into it, and, as we believed, rightfully, our sympathy was with him, and we believed Powderly's to be. He called for an assessment from our district for Irons, which we paid like men, and what else could we believe but that Powderly recognized Irons and his strike? And I will undertake to say that, if Irons had succeeded, he would hav been to-day one of the great men in Richmond, and greatly in the way of Powderly's aspirations. Who could see this sooner than Powderly?

Now, Brother Watson says Powderly is not a boasting man. This proves he knows nothing of what he says. If he had read the papers, he would hav seen whether Powderly ever boasted. When he was in arbitration with Gould about the strike, he published to the world that he, Powderly, made Jay Gould acknowledge that he, Powderly, was master-workman of the world. He then had all the recognition he wanted, and pretended sickness and went home, as he generally does when he gets recognized. His next bull was in giving the matter for settlement to poor Irons and his men, taking particular pains to say to them, so Jay Gould could hear, "You shall not intimidate or hinder traffic." What sweet words for the syndicates! Virtually he tied the hands of his men and surrendered them to their enemy.

Powderly issues many private circulars, and invariably they are published in the leading papers before they reach the assemblies he pretends they are for. Did you ever observe this, Brother Watson? We find Powderly at Washington wallowing in luxury with Jay Gould and other monopolists, sending his so-called private circulars to the Knights of Labor saying that he would hav Congressional aid for the laborers. Think, will you, of the idea of going for sympathy to Congress, a body that always legislates for the rich and against the poor! I think that Powderly is to-day the greatest boaster in America. You say he is no boaster. He is self-conceited, and sooner or later will sell out the Knights of Labor, if he has not already done it.

He ruined Irons, I believe, for a purpose. And how a brother of the Knights of Labor can call Irons a traitor is more than I can understand. Irons to-day is financially a ruined man, his family scattered, his little home gone—and all for the good of the order, as he honestly believed. This attack from a brother upon a brother in distress is a shame.

CAPTAIN KENNEDY.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Little Brown Hands.

They drive home the cows from the pasture,
Up through the long shady lane,
Where the quail whistles loud in the wheat-field,
All yellow with ripening grain.

They find, in the thick waving grasses,
Where the scarlet-lipped strawberry grows;
They gather the earliest snow-drops
And the first crimson buds of the rose.

They toss the hay in the meadow;
They gather the elder-blooms white;
They find where the dusky grapes purple
In the soft-tinted October light.

They know where the apples hang ripest,
And are sweeter than Italy's wines;
They know where the fruit is the thickest
On the long thorny blackberry vines.

They gather the delicate sea-weeds,
And build tiny castles of sand;
They pick up the beautiful sea-shells,
Fairy barks that hav drifted to land.

They wave from the tall, rocking tree-tops,
Where the oriole's hammock nest swings,
And at night-time are folded in slumber
By a song that a fond mother sings.

Those who toil bravely are strongest,
The humble and poor become great;
And from those brown-handed children
Shall grow mighty rulers of state.

The pen of the author and statesman,
The noble and wise of our land,
The sword, and chisel, and palet
Shall be held in the little brown hand.

A Prize for the Little Ones.

Not long ago we attended a session of the Children's Progressiv Lyceum. The topic presented to the children for discussion was this: "The Spirit World and What We Know About It." We thought it a pretty knotty subject for grown-up people to grapple, let alone children.

We propose for the consideration of the children who read this corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER the following subject:

"THE WORLD WE LIV IN."

To the little girl of twelve years, or under that age, who will tell us in the most interesting way that which she knows concerning this world in which she livs, will be presented three small articles—toys—which were brought from Europe recently, and given to the editor of the Corner to be used at her discretion. Boys may write upon the above-named theme also, but the articles will be presented to the girl who writes the best essay, because adapted to girls and not boys.
—ED. C. C.

Hygiene.

[We take pleasure in presenting below the sensible essay on Hygiene which takes the prize of five dollars offered by a friend several weeks since. The next best article on the subject will appear another time, and, although it does not take a money prize, it is highly commended, and shows, as well as the one below, that we hav some very bright intellects among the children of our Corner.—ED. C.C.]

There'll be something for children to do,
There'll be something for children to do;
In the bright world above
Where there's joy, peace, and love,
There'll be something for children to do.

Yes, but we little Freethinkers who liv in cities which are paved with nothing better than stones, and who do not look forward so expectantly to the one that is paved with gold, hav something to do in this world.

The kind of people who are wanted to make this home so that people can liv in and enjoy it, without dreaming of that "other world," of which we know nothing, are bright, cheerful, unselfish, happy ones.

Now, if people were well and free from "aches and pains," nothing would be easier or more natural than for them to be happy and cheery. A sick person, in thinking so much of himself, becomes selfish, very often, and selfishness is one of those little weeds which must be pulled up before true happiness can reign.

So you see, little brother and sister Freethinkers, hygiene must be one of your studies—take it instead of Bible reading; it is a great deal more interesting.

Our bodies are covered with little "pores," and they are to let the poison out of the body, as the window lets the poisonous air out of the house.

These pores are kept open by frequent washings and brisk rubbings. So first, we hav water inside and outside. Now, let us see about air:

All the blood in our bodies passes through our lungs, where it is purified by the pure air which we breathe. Every other time we breathe we send out bad, impure air, and every other time we should inhale pure air.

If we sleep in a closed room, we use all the good air, and then inhale the bad, which is another cause of poor health.

People who sleep in sunny, airy rooms are much more healthy than those who sleep in dark ones.

We are affected by light and air about as much as plants. So much for sun and air.

Besides the water, sun, and air, we must hav plenty of exercise to develop the muscles, and so make us strong. Our bodies are boxes in which are packed all our organs, and the boxes are just the right size, and not a bit too large.

Much sickness, as well as discomfort, is caused by wearing tight clothing. If we had a box just filled with diamonds, we would not try to get them into a smaller box, and so scratch and deface them. And yet many try to make a smaller box for their heart, lungs, etc., that are worth more to them than anything else.

Early to bed and early to rise
Makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise.

Much more can be accomplished early in the morning than at night, and you will feel much better for rising early.

I know a man about eighty-three years of age, who has always kept early hours, and now, though so old, he can see to read perfectly without glasses. He must feel wealthy to hav such good eyesight. He was wise to keep early hours, and he is remarkably healthy.

Stand erect! If you think awhile, you will see many reasons why stoop-shouldered people usually hav a weak feeling in the pit of their stomachs, which would be remedied by their standing erect.

And then, it givs a person self-respect to stand straight. Every tramp I ever saw carried his chin on his chest.

Your feet should be kept warm and dry, and remember that they cannot be kept warm when they are in tight shoes, which keep the blood from circulating freely.

"Colds" are very disagreeable company, which we can avoid if we try. If we are careful not to sit in a draught, and to keep our feet warm and dry, and careful about changing our clothes as the weather changes, and never to leave the fire to enter a cold room without an extra garment, we may get the upper-hand of the family of colds.

Treat your stomach kindly; do not giv it too much work to do in the way of digesting greasy, rich food, but do not be afraid of overworking the stomach's assistants, the teeth; and the salary for the stomach's assistants is small—only a good brushing two or three times a day.

Think of having several hundred doctors in a single city to cure the diseases brought on by ignorance!

"The last is the best of all the game," says the nursery rhyme, and this little poem is certainly one of the best and most useful ever written:

ADVICE.

Take the open air,
The more you take the better;
Follow nature's laws,
To the very letter.

Let the doctors go
To the Bay of Biscay;
Let alone the gin,
The brandy, and the whisky.

Freely exercise,
Keep your spirits cheerful;
Let no dread of sickness
Make you ever fearful.

Eat the simplest food,
Drink the pure cold water,
Then you will be well—
Or, at least, you "oughter."

LAURA PRICE STEWART (age 14).
Cleveland, O.

"Kiss Me, too, Papa."

"Hand me that collar-button," demanded George Wellsby, turning with an annoyed air toward his little girl. "Learn to let things alone, will you? There now, tune up and howl."

"George, don't speak to the child that way," said Mrs. Wellsby, depositing a shirt on a chair.

"Well, why can't she behave herself? Every time she sees that I am getting ready to go to any place she makes a point of hindering me. Let that cravat alone."

"Put down papa's cravat, darling. She's too young to know any better."

"No, she isn't. Other people's children know how to behave. I'll bet I'll miss the train. I am sometimes tempted to wish she had never been born."

"O George!" exclaimed his wife, "I wouldn't say that."

"Confound it, she worries me so. I havn't more than time to catch the train," hurriedly kissing his wife.

"Kiss me, too, papa."

"I ought not to, you are so bad," stooping and kissing her. "Good-bye. Will be back in three or four days."

Mr. Wellsby is a commercial traveler, a kind and tender-hearted man, but subject at times to nervousness. Seated with several vivacious acquaintances, speeding over the country, a little voice would steal in between the roars of merry laughter and say:

"Kiss me, too, papa."

In the sample-room of the village hotel, between the inquiries of purchasers, he could hear the voice, and at night when he lay down he could see the little hands reaching toward him, and could hear, "Kiss me, too, papa."

"Wellsby, what's the matter, old fellow?" asked a companion.

They were in a conveyance, riding toward an interior town.

"I don't feel very well to-day."

"Do any business back here?"

"Yes, did very well."

"I didn't do anything, but I won't let it weigh me down. Got a letter from the house this morning. The old boy is kicking about expenses. Got a bottle of cocktail here."

"I don't care for any."

"Then there must be something the matter with you."

On a night train going home. He could see the little hands. "Clack, clack, clack—kiss me, too; kiss me, too."

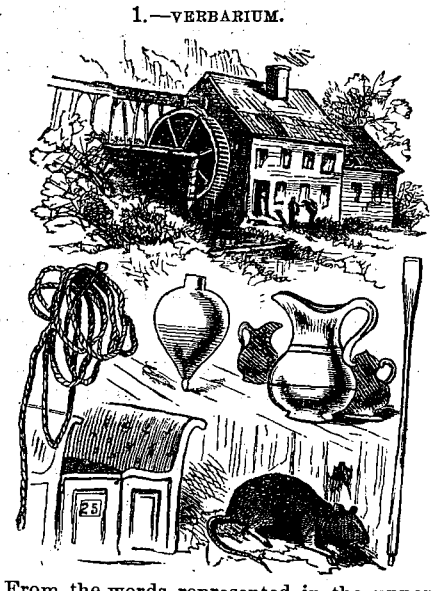
"What's the news?" he asked of a friend, when he had stepped upon the platform and called a hackman.

"Nothing, I believe; everything is quiet."

"No scarlet fever or diphtheria raging, is there?"

"No; not that I hav heard."

The familiar scenes brought rest to his mind. He looked back upon his trip with a shudder, like one who awakes and contemplates a nightmare through which he has just passed.



"Good-night," he said, paying the hackman. "A light burning. Julia is expecting me," he mused, ascending the steps.

A ghastly face met him at the door. A voice in agony whispered:

"O George! our little girl is dead."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

THE RISE OF
INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY
From Thales to Copernicus.
By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."
Octavo, 458 pp. . PRICE, $3.50.

THE CREDIT FONCIER OF SINALOA.

WHAT'S TO BE DONE?

A NIHILISTIC ROMANCE.

By N. G. TCHERNYCHEWSKY. With a portrait of the Author. Translated by BENJ. R. TUCKER.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

Poetry.

The Other Side of It.

I didn't ask to come here, and I do not want to stay,
I don't find much place for me; as a rule I'm in the way.
What I feel as if I could do, I get no chance to try;
I see no fun to liv for, and I hav no right to die.

I'm made to pant and struggle for what I'm not to win;
I hate myself for meanness, and I'm just cut out to sin.
I'm set racing down a road for a goal it does not lead to;
I'm held liable for lots of things I never hav agreed to.

The life I never wanted I'm expected to giv thanks for;
I'm required to draw prizes that I'm given only blanks for;
I'm here without my sanction, yet in duty bound to stay;
I yearn to build a marble house, and I've got to work with clay.

Well! I didn't ask to come here, and I don't care a cent to stay;
And—though I face the music—I've just a word to say;
Life's hard enough to swallow; I don't want the bitter pill,
But it's quite too much to take it and be licked for being ill!

—Emma V. Sheridan.

The School Question—Its Dangers and Remedies.

An appendix to the Ninth Demand of the Secular Union is wanted. Since long ago the Catholic clergymen of the United States hav made a clandestin, and lately an open, war against our public schools. They pretend that children in the West receive no religious education, and that in the East they are taught Protestantism by prayers, by books containing objectionable religious teachings, and by the reading of the Protestant Bible in the public schools, contrary to the meaning of the Constitution. This pretension is, unfortunately, correct, and it givs them, apparently, a good pretext for their warfare. I say pretext, because it is nothing else. The real end sought by them is the division of the public school-moneys, and possibly the abolition of these institutions.

Since the arrival of that holy man (?) Monsignor Capel, Pope Leo's emissary, costly Catholic schools, academies, Jesuits' and priests' colleges, convents, and other Catholic buildings hav sprouted like mushrooms all over the country, by orders from Rome.

Public papers report every day some of the audacious outbursts of the Catholic priests against our public schools, but these noisy shots from the pulpit are not as dangerous as the secret stabs thrust in the dark by the Catholic priest while in the confessional. There the penitent, be it male or female, but particularly the latter, is enjoined to send their children to the Catholic school, and to support the same with money. The public school is depicted as one of the gates of hell, where perdition and damnation for the children are sure to follow. If the terrorized Catholic hesitate to make a formal promis to obey the priest's order, he is refused the absolution of his sins, and, besides, threatened with excommunication, or at least to hav the doors of the church shut against his face.

Now, to realize the generally successful effect of such threatenings, we must remember that a Catholic layman believes absolutely that his priest has the power to open to him the gates of heaven or hell at his will.

This superstitious and absurd belief is the source of the immense power which the Catholic priest exerts on his parishioners. Few, very few, would dare resist the priest's injunctions and run the risk to be spotted as a black sheep in the flock, and as a rebel against the church of Rome. This power is so absolute that if to-day a law was enacted in all the states (as it is in some foreign countries), compelling parents to send their children to the public schools, under heavy penalties, and if then the pope would forbid it, under threats of excommunication, there is probably not one Catholic out of ten thousand who would disobey the pope; they would rather prove criminals and traitors to this country by obeying a foreign power.

This Catholic machinery in the United States is certainly "the wheel within a wheel," and unfortunately that wheel is fixed at one end of a long shaft whose crank and motiv power is at Rome.

Evidently, after a few years, we must expect that this foreign organization will produce dreadful and bitter fruits. Then, as a consequence, we will hav another kind of Mormon resistance and probably bloodshed. The Catholics undoubtedly will be enjoined by Rome to refuse the payment of taxes for the support of public schools which they don't use, and cannot conscientiously use as imposing a hated creed on their children; then, of course, the Catholics will obey their foreign master and rebel against country tax laws. Here is the danger. Now for the remedy: To avoid this possible calamity by depriving the Catholic clergy of any semblance of good reason or apparent plausible pretext for their war on the public schools or their incitement to refuse taxes, I submit that the Secular Union, at its next Congress, will amend or remodel its ninth demand or even enact a tenth one if preferable, about as follows: "We demand that prayers and religious exercises, of any kind whatever, be positivly forbidden in all the public schools; That the Bible as a text-book be absolutely prohibited; That all educational books be corrected and revised so as not to leave standing one single sentence implying religious teachings, which shall be left exclusivly to the parents, ministers, or priests, but entirely out of the public schools."

Secularist and ex-Catholic.

The Natural Sciences in Our Common Schools.

Imitated from Huxley by J. M. Cottinger.

I hinted several times, e. g., in "The Youth's Liberal Guide," that the introduction of the natural sciences in our common schools would advance them considerably. I rank among them physiology, geology, natural philosophy, zoölogy, botany, chemistry, and geology. For this time I make free to report the opinion of the celebrated naturalist, Thomas H. Huxley, given in his "Lay Sermons," which also are known in America, He thinks that fifteen hundred years ago, the child of a wealthy Roman citizen learned the same things as the children of our age—to read and write his nativ language (perhaps the Greek, too), the elements of mathematics, history, geography (as it was used at that time), and religion. Besides, he thinks that he would not err to say that if such a Christian-Roman boy could be transposed into one of our public schools, in order to participate in the course of instruction, he would not find a single new idea, especially no other intuition of the universe as that which predominated in his century. And still there is certainly a great difference between the civilization of the fourth and that of the nineteenth century. And what circumstances occasioned this difference? Huxley answers, without hesitating, "The development of the natural sciences during the last and present century."

Modern civilization rests upon the natural sciences; all ideas of the present age are rooted in them; they entered into the works of our best poets, and even the great book-learned writers who feign to despise them owe them their best productions. The greatest revolution of mind which mankind ever saw is inaugurated insensibly by their influence. They teach mankind that the highest court of human mind is observation and experience, not blind authority; they teach us to esteem the value of demonstration; they create profound faith in the existence of immutable moral and physical laws, which to obey is the highest goal of a rational being.

But the old, stereotypical system of education takes not any notice of all this. The riddles and difficulties of the natural sciences meet the poorest boy at every step, nevertheless, we educate him in such a manner that he will enter into the world as ignorant of their laws and facts as he was when he was born. Posterity will cry shame upon us if we don't correct this deplorable condition of public schools.

True, Professor Huxley speaks of the common schools of his country, of England; but are not the same defects found in ours as in the English ones? I agree that ours excel them in one regard, viz., Religion is no branch of the common schools of America so far, and therefore the superstition and mutual hatred of the different sects is not inoculated in the brain of youth in our schools; but are the natural sciences also a part of their program? It may be that some of their branches are taught here and there, e.g., physiology of human body; but into which common school are they all introduced? Only in Switzerland I found Huxley's ideal of common schools partly realized. Already, fifty years ago, parts of science taught in every primary school were: Zoölogy, botany, mineralogy, and natural philosophy. It is my honest persuasion that it is absolutely necessary for the lasting welfare of our republic to make the elements of the natural sciences part of our elementary education, and I should consider their introduction into our common schools as a new epoch in the history of our country.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

The object of this work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then to trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning. It contains quotations from nearly all the sacred books of heathen nations, and from other rare and valuable works which are not accessible to people in general. The chapters are so arranged that it is a perfect cyclopedia of reference. Years of research would be necessary to discover all the information it contains. It is a most searching investigation into the origin of Christianity. Every fact is verified by copious notes and authorities, so that it may be trusted as a thoroughly reliable work. It contains information which will be startling to many.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

News of the Week.

WALT WHITMAN, the poet, is reported to be failing in health. He is 67 years old.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND has appointed Thursday, Nov. 25th, as Thanksgiving day.

ACTIVITY in business circles is reported from Charleston, S. C., the scene of the earthquake disaster.

THE pork-packing houses of Chicago returned to the ten-hour schedule on Monday. Wages were slightly increased.

THE international double-scull sweepstakes race on the Thames, London, was won by Teemer and Hamm, Americans.

HERBERT SPENCER is in a low state of health. For some weeks he has been unable to go about except in a wheel chair.

MR. BLAINE, of Maine, addressed an audience of 8,000 in Newark, N. J., on Saturday night. His subject, it may be added, was the tariff.

THE Spiritualists' Home near Westfield, N. J., where annual summer meetings of the Spiritualists are held, was destroyed by fire last Sunday.

MANY of the ministers of New York city preached political sermons last Sunday. The majority of them deprecated the movements of the working classes.

THE store at No. 21 Clinton Place was burnt out Sunday night. The fire came a trifle too late to hit the TRUTH SEEKER office, which vacated those premises in 1883.

AT Shelbyville, Ill., a woman, supposed to hav been hired by liquor men, attempted on the 30th ult. to murder the wife of Rev. J. L. Douttritt, conductor of a Prohibition journal.

ATTORNEY SALOMON, counsel for the Chicago Anarchists, appeared before Judge Gary last week Friday, and asked to be heard on the motion for a new trial. The court peremptorily refused to listen to any argument.

THE Rev. Mr. Staunton, of Brooklyn, who was recently found guilty of ministerial conduct toward an unmarried woman, has grasped the situation and resigned his pastorate. Mrs. Staunton is suing for a divorce.

THE New York mayoralty contest last Tuesday resulted in the election of Hewitt (Dem.), with 90,000 votes. George had 68,000 votes, and Roosevelt (Rep.) 60,000. The result cost the winners a large sum of money.

A TRAIN on the Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul road was ditched at East Rio, Wis., on Thursday, the 28th ult. One car was set on fire by the stove and thirteen persons were burnt or suffocated. The accident was caused by an open switch.

T. V. POWDERLY, general master workman of the Knights of Labor, had a conference with Cardinal Gibbons at Baltimore, on the 29th ult., in regard to the attitude of the church toward Mr. Powderly's organization. The two leaders exchanged assurances of distinguished consideration, and Mr. Powderly departed with the information that the Knights would not be interfered with.

THE statue of Liberty was unveiled and dedicated in New York on Thursday, the 28th ult., with considerable display. Bartholdi, the designer of the statue, was present. There was a great parade in the streets that day, but it did not equal in size the procession of Henry George's supporters who marched through Union Square on Saturday night. Very appropriately, the statue of Liberty stands with its back toward the shores of New Jersey.

FATHER SHERMAN, the Brooklyn Catholic priest who recently married Tillie McCoy, is a sad rascal. Miss Julia Mulvaney has had him arrested for betraying her before he knew Tillie, and while he was in court answering to that charge, Mrs. Dora Davis confronted him with a board bill for himself and a woman who was neither Miss McCoy nor Miss Mulvaney. The story was started that Father Sherman had renounced Catholicism and become a Protestant, but this slander he indignantly denies.

THE magnificent stone building of the Case School of Applied Science, which was completed about a year ago in Cleveland, O., at a cost of $200,000, was burnt Oct. 26th. The building contained all the latest appliances for the demonstration of science. The chemical apparatus and the geological collection were among the finest in the country. The chemical appliances were valued at $20,000. The total loss was $250,000, and the insurance was $15,000. The school was built with money left by the late Leonard Case, the Cleveland millionaire.

Odds and Ends.

IF marriage is a lottery love-letters ought not to be allowed in the mails.

TEACHER: "Hans, name three beasts of prey." Hans: "Two lions and a tiger."

"BESSIE, temper is an awful thing. You ought to get rid of it." "Why, mamma, only yesterday you told me to keep it."

IT was pretty nearly half past 11 o'clock when he began to sing, "How Can I Leave Thee?" to his best girl. Pretty soon her papa came down-stairs and he found out how easy it was.

OLD Mrs. Bently: "I see, John, that this new faith cure has been the means of savin' a great many people." Old Mr. Bently: "So I've heerd." Old Mrs. Bently: "Well, the fust time you pass a drug-store, John, I wish you'd stop and get a bottle of it."

HUSBAND reading morning paper, in response to his wife's question whether there is any news: "Well, here are two columns given up to the American board." Wife: "What's it all about?" Husband (languidly): "I don't know, but if I should read it all through, I'm sure I'd be an American bored."

WASN'T Herod an old man before he learned to dance?" a little girl asked of her mother. "Why, my child, what on earth put that in your head?" "Nothing much, only I was reading in my Sunday-school lesson that the daughter of Herodius danced before Herod." The little girl had to dance off to bed.

"CAN'T you tell me, sir, where I might find a situation?" asked a young man of a Chicago citizen. "I am a stranger here." "What at?" was the reply. "Oh, anything at all. I am industrious, I am honest, I go to church regularly; I don't drink, I don't chew, I don't lie." "Ah, I see. Just apply around the corner at the dime museum."

AFTER the Ninth District convention had adjourned, a crowd of colored delegates, enthusiastic admirers of Chauncey I. Filley, were discussing the day's work at the bar. "Dat Mistah Filley am a pow'ful smart man," said one. "Dat's what I'se sayin', too." "Dere hain't no pusson in dis town smarter'n him." The other delegate hesitated a moment. "Spec' not; but he hain't as smart as God." "Dat's so, too; but jis' you wait till he gits as ole as God." The portrait of old Ossowattamie Brown on the wall smiled and shook its head.

ONE of the clergy of a large Scotch town, having been ruralizing, was returning home from a day's piscatorial enjoyment, his rod across his shoulder, when he met a youth with whom he was slightly acquainted, who happened to be carrying a bridle in his hand. The divine, thinking to be witty, even at the risk of being personal, pointed significantly to the bridle, and, with a shake of his head and a smile, remarked in passing, "A bridle for the ass;" to which the young man, nothing daunted, and pointing to the fishing-rod over the clerical shoulder, instantaneously rejoined, "And a rod for the fool's back."

A SCOTCH minister on a visiting tour through his parish had occasion to pass close to a farm the tenant of which had gone over to the Free church. To show no spite, the minister decided to enter, which he did, and found both the farmer and his wife at tea. Farmer: "There's a guid day, minister; ye're jist in time to tak' a cup wi' us. Fill oot a cup, Janet." Janet complies, during which the minister remarked, "Your teapot runs very slowly, Mrs. Brown." Janet: "It dis that, minister. It's gey like yersel' when ye're preachin'—sort o' slow in the delivery."

HE PUT THEM IN THE BOX.

"Looking for Jake, I suppose," said Sergeant Bendall as Mr. Dunder entered the station yesterday with a very long face.

"Vhell, I like to see Shake. I doan' know vhat I shall do mit dot boy."

"What is it this time?"

Mr. Dunder laid five alleged half-dollar pieces on the desk in a row and replied,

"Maybe you see dose?"

"I do."

"Maybe it vhas goot money?"

"Every one of 'em is bogus."

"Dot ish so. Some fellers pass 'em on me for beer sometimes vhen I vhas in a hurry. I puts 'em all in a box behindt der bar."

"Well?"

"Vhell, last Sunday Shake takes a notion to go mit Sunday-school. Dot vhas all right. It vhas der vhay to make goot boys. Dis morning der superintendent comes down to me mid dis bogus money and says,

"'Mr. Dunder, you haf some boy named Shake?'

"'Yes.'

"'He vhas mit our Sunday-school yesterday. He vhas a werry nice boy.'

"'So he vhas.'

"'We take up a lidle collection to buy some new books und your son Shake puts all dis money in der box. What shall you do aboudt it?'

"Vhell, sergeant, you see how it vhas. Dot vhas some more tricks by Shake, und I haf to shell out two dollar and a half goot money to make up."

"And where is Jake?"

"He shlips oudt vhen dot man comes in, und I doan' find him any more. Maybe you see him pretty soon? If so, yust tell him dot vhas sooch a good shoke dot I laugh all oafer, und dot he can come home. "I see."

"If you hear somebody yell out dat he vhas kilt und won't nefer do so any more you go right along und mind your business. It vhas Shake und me, und I vhas taking dot bogus money out of his hide!"

Gems of Thought.

IMMODERATE selfishness is man's great fault.—D. M. Bennett.

To my mind, nothing justifies me for having adopted the trade of literature except the remembrance that I had no other but these two—that of a school-master and that of a priest: in the one case with the fair prospect of speedy maceration and starvation; in the other of perjury, which is infinitly worse.—Carlyle's Letters.

MILTON had been intended for the church and had been sent to college with that view. By the time he left Cambridge at twenty-four, it had become clear both to himself and his family that he could never submit his understanding to the trammels of church formularies. His later mind, about 1641, is expressed by himself in his own forcible style: "The church, to whose service, by the intention of my parents and friends, I was destined of a child, and in mine own resolutions, till coming to some maturity of years, and perceiving what tyranny had invaded the church, that he who would take orders must subscribe slave and take an oath withal . . . I thought it better to prefer a blameless silence before this sacred office of speaking, bought and begun with servitude and forswearing."—Mark Pattison's Milton.

IF after birth the baby dies before it thinks, though after it has breathed, where in this case is the trace of the soul? If it should be conceded that my soul only began with my body, why is it to be maintained that it will not cease with my body? If, as is pretended, my "soul" is not identifiable with my body, how is it that all intellectual manifestations are affected by my bodily conditions, growth, health, decay? If the soul is immortal and immaterial, how is it that temporary pressure on the brain may paralyze and prevent all mental manifestation, and that fracture by a poker or by a bullet may annihilate the possibility of any further mental activity?—Bradlaugh's Has Man a Soul?

IT will not do for geologists and astronomers who wish to retain some rags of orthodoxy, however soiled and torn, to argue, as most do, "that the Bible was not intended as a revelation of physical science, but only of moral and religious truth." This does not meet the difficulty; for the Bible does not merely use the common language and to assume the common errors, on these points—it givs a distinct account of the creation, in the same style, in the same narrativ, in the same book, in which it narrates the fall of man, the deluge, the revelation to Abraham, the history of Jacob and Joseph. The writer evidently had no conception that when he related the creation of the earth, the sea, and the sun, he was inventing or perpetuating a monstrous error; and that when he related the fall he was revealing a mighty and mysterious truth; and when he narrated the promis of Abraham, he was recording a wondrous prophecy. The Bible professes to giv information on all these points alike: and we hav precisely the same scriptural grounds for believing that God first made the earth, and then the sun for the especial benefit of the earth; that the globe was submerged by rain which lasted forty days, and that everything was destroyed except the animals which Noah packed into the ark, as we hav for believing that Adam and Eve were driven out of paradise for a transgression; that God promised Abrabam to redeem the world through his progeny, and that Jacob and Moses were the subjects of the divine communications recorded as being made to them. All the statements are made in the same affirmativ style and on the same authority. The Bible equally professes to teach us fact on all these matters. There is no escape by any quibble from the grasp of this conclusion.—W. R. Greg.

CHARLES V., when he abdicated a throne, and retired to the monastery of St. Juste, amused himself with the mechanical arts and particularly with that of a watchmaker. He one day exclaimed, "What an egregious fool must I hav been to hav squandered so much blood and treasure, in an absurd attempt to make men think alike, when I can not even make a few watches keep time together!" —Colton's Lacon. [NOTE.—It does the retired emperor credit that he saw the folly of his career of persecution before he went to supper,

Not where he was to eat,
But where he was to be eaten.

But, curiously enough, his eyes seem to hav been holden from seeing its wickedness. If in early life he had seen the iniquity of the career that lay before him, he might hav left off persecuting for religious opinion. Therefore he began it—if the reader will pardon my using the words of another celebrated monarch. By hereditary transmission he sent on the cruel spirit of persecution to his son—Philip II., of most accursed memory—and gave all the monarchs of Europe "an ill example." They were not slow to follow it, and, indeed, we begin to fear that, in our own republic, we are nourishing a nest of vipers—especially, but not exclusivly, of the Catholic variety—in whom the spirit of persecution, though "scotched," is not by any means killed. There is a loose idea abroad that the age of persecution, like the age of "chivalry," is passed, but if the churches are not closely watched, we may find ourselvs at no distant day involved in a new St. Bartholomew massacre. In the duplicity of the priests and the ignorance of the people, I see "rocks ahead," and unless we can raise up and keep up a better class of statesmen than any we now hav, I cannot but fear that evil days are in store for us. If Liberals of all creeds would but unite and assume their proper position, all might yet be well. Will they? That's the question?—Hylax (C. W. C.)].

THE outcome of faith in dogma is not only bigotry, but also hypocrisy. Many and many a Christian will say, "I do not believe in hell or in a devil, or in total depravity;" yet, by accepting the creed, they profess to believe all these things. Is not this hypocrisy—to think one thing and to profess another?

Who dares think one thing and another tell,
My heart detests him as the gates of hell!

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 13. No. 46. PUBLISHED WEEKLY. New York, Saturday, November 13, 1886. 33 CLINTON PLACE. $3.00 per year

Notes and Clippings.

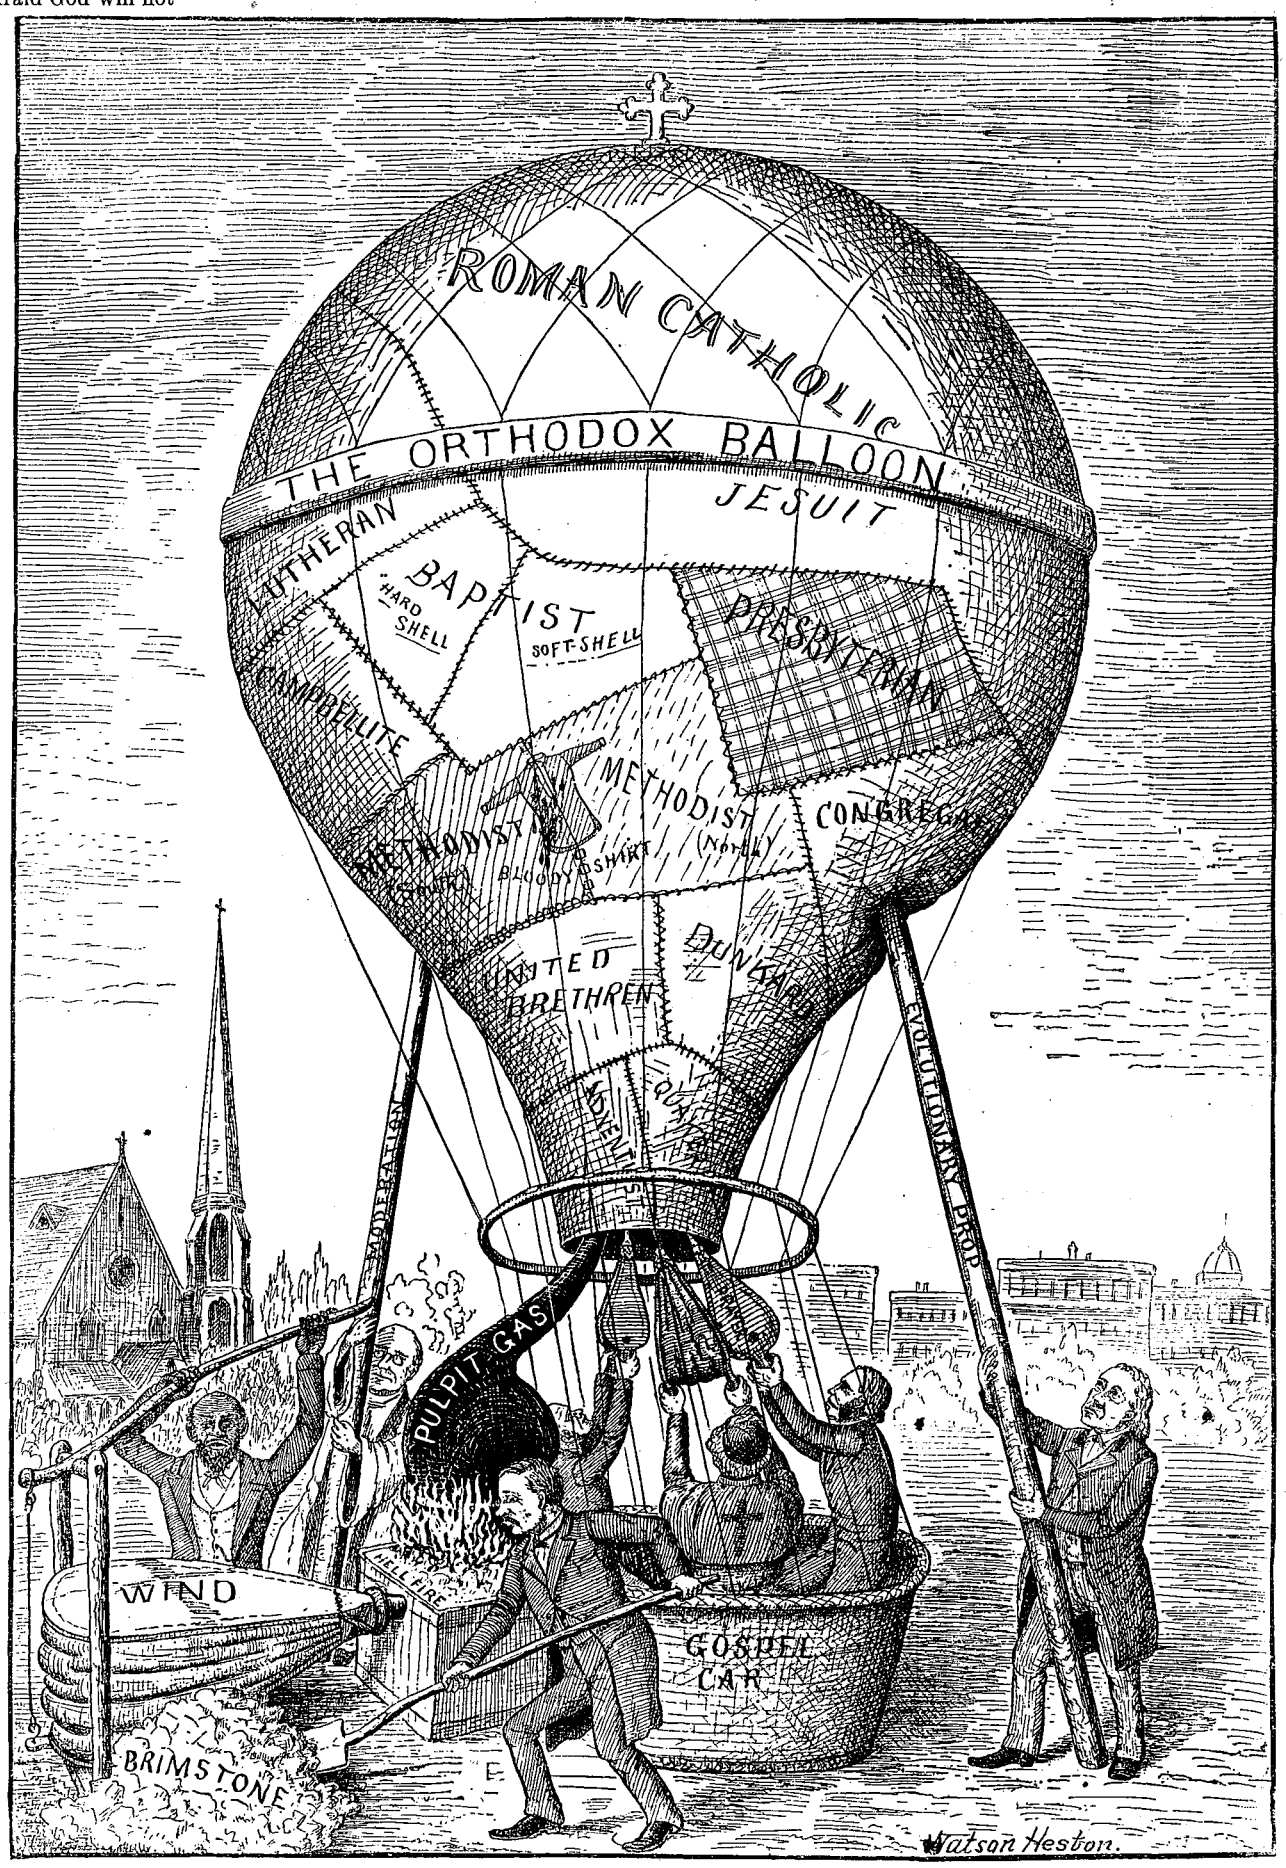
A TIRED little girl of four, hurrying through her bed-time prayers, was chided by her mother, who said, "I am afraid God will not be very well pleased with such a prayer." "Well," answered the child petulantly, as she lifted her head from her mother's lap and pushed back the curls from her sleepy blue eyes, "it's all he'll get out of me to-night."

THE monotony of existence in Ireland is relieved every week or two by a riot wherever two or three are gathered together in the name of religion. Last week Friday there was one at Belfast.

FAMILIAR with history: Wife—"I do wish you would join the church, Sam." Wicked skeptic—"Good heavens! we quarrel enough as it is. If I were to become a Christian we should be fighting all the time."—Life.

THE new marriage laws of Pennsylvania, framed to prevent hasty marriages, hav been in operation a year. They hav had one certain result; they hav increased the revenues of the Jersey parsons who liv near the Pennsylvania line. One parson stayed home during his summer vacation and made some $300 in fees. Another has cards, giving his residence, and minute directions how to get there, distributed on all the ferryboats plying between Philadelphia and Camden.

THE production of gold aud silver in the world during the calendar year 1885 was: gold, $101,580,000; silver, calculated at its coining value, nearly $125,000,000. Notwithstanding the large depreciation in the value of silver, the production of silver in the world, has steadily increased. The United States still preserves first rank among the nations of the world as the largest producer of the precious metals, its production of gold aud silver during the year having reached the sum of $83,400,000, or about two-fifths of the production of the whole world. The coinage of gold by the nations of the world during the calendar year amounted to about $95,000,000, aud of silver to $97,000,000.



AT a conference recently held in England to consider the best means of extending the usefulness of the Sunday-School Union Library statistics were read showing that male teachers, while, on the whole, preferring solid reading, nevertheless read large quantities of fiction; female teachers, however, read two-thirds fiction, and only a book and a half a year each of Biblical character. This frightful revelation induced the New Jerusalem Gazette to send a special commissioner to inquire into the condition of the lady teachers' souls. He found, says F. T. Gould in the Secular Review, that the starvation diet of one and a half book per year of a Biblical character had reduced their souls to mere anatomies. Some were so emaciated that the commissioner could hav easily placed half a dozen in his coat-pocket. He concludes his report by recommending that the Sunday-School Union and other religious societies should issue no more works of fiction. A capital idea! for, in that case, the Bible will be withdrawn from circulation.

"AH," said the conceited young parson, "I hav this afternoon been preaching to a congregation of asses." "Was that the reason you called them beloved brethren?" inquired a strong-minded lady.

THE Nashville Christian Advocate remarks, "With one-half of the American people overworking and one-half of the other half overplaying, disease overtakes the one class and Satan the other." Fortunately, we still hav the woods as a refuge.

THE French Chamber of Deputies hav agreed upon an Education bill which enacts that education in public schools of every class is to be exclusivly entrusted to lay persons. No religious orders need send their members to apply for positions as teachers.

PREACHING a funeral sermon over the remains of a millionaire will always bring tears to the eyes of the minister.——Another new evangelist has arisen in the South. The South will do well to raise more cotton and fewer evangelists.——Pope Leo has given ten thousand francs to the earthquake sufferers in Greece, and a popular subscription is being taken up among the shaken people for the purpose of raising twenty thousand francs to purchase a new vase for the Vatican.——Bishop McNierney was accorded a reception of great pomp and solemnity on his return to Albany from his visit to Rome. He was escorted to the cathedral by his parishioners, who furnished an open carriage drawn by four white horses, and the only drawback to the success of the show was the fact that, through some oversight, they forgot to lay him in state.—Puck.

TRYING TO MAKE THE OLD THING FLOAT.

YANKEE girl: "Mad! I should say I did come home mad! I shall never go out as a missionary to the Turks again." Omaha lady: "Would not they listen to your arguments?" "Oh, they listened respectfully enough, but when I talked to one of them about the sin of having so many wives, what do you think the brute said?" "I am sure I don't know." "He said if Turkish women were like me, one would be plenty."—Cleveland Herald.

"YES, Bobby," said the minister, who was dining with the family, "everything in this world has its use, although we may not know what it is. Now, there is the fly, for instance. You wouldn't think that flies were good for anything, yet——" "Oh, yes, I would," interrupted Bobby; "I know what flies are good for." "What, Bobby?" "Papa says that they are the only thing what keeps him awake when you are preaching."

PEOPLE visiting Montreal should beware of the hackmen. They are too pious to be honest. The Montreal Hackmen's Union hav issued the following circular: "It having been represented to us that it was wrong to work on Sunday, for good and sufficient reasons—first, because God commanded man to keep the Sabbath holy, and second, because our horses require rest from labor on the seventh day as much as we do ourselvs—therefore, we, the hackmen of Montreal believing that we should act in accordance with God's law, do hereby agree to abstain from labor on Sundays in future, and request all hackmen not to bring out their carriages for hire on Sunday, and God help us to keep steadfast in this resolution." Such piety in these days is suspicious.

Mrs. Stanton and the Woman's Bible.

NEW YORK, Oct. 28, 1886.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am asked by Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, who sailed for London yesterday, to send a note to you—since her last days here were so full of business that she was prevented from so doing—to say that she is extremely sorry that it will be impossible for her to attend the Congress of the American Secular Union this year.

She fully expected and desired to be here and to deliver a lecture; but family circumstances became such that an earlier departure was necessary. She expects to be in London with her daughter, Mrs. Stanton-Blatch (who is just such another stanch Liberal and brilliant woman as her distinguished mother), until next May. She then expects to return to America, and says that that lecture shall be heard yet. So, perhaps, next year we may hav that pleasure.

While she is abroad she will be engaged upon the Woman's Bible, in which she is now so deeply interested. The resources of the British Museum will be at her command, and many books of reference not accessible to us here will thus yield their store of knowledge to the new enterprise.

The wonderful enthusiasm of this beautiful and gifted woman at her age—she is past seventy—is a delight and inspiration to those of us who hav been working with her; but I hope, most sincerely, that we will be able to go on successfully and rapidly with the work, as laid out for the American branch of the committee, even though she is not with us.

It is a very large undertaking, indeed, as you will see by the inclosed paper from Mrs. Stanton (which she directed me to send to you), but I believe that it is one that can and will be done well, since it is under the management of this brave, earnest, and able woman.

If you hav room in your paper for the inclosed article by Mrs. Stanton (which appeared first in a Boston journal), I hav no doubt that it would greatly interest many of your readers who might not otherwise see it.

Mrs. Stanton left a message for the Congress with me, which will be delivered in due time.

Very sincerely, HELEN H. GARDENER.

THE WOMAN'S BIBLE.

So many letters are daily received asking questions about the Woman's Bible—as to the extent of revision, and the standpoint from which it will be conducted—that it seems best, though every detail is not as yet matured, to state the plan as concisely as possible, upon which those who hav been in consultation during the summer propose to do the work.

I. The object is to revise only those texts and chapters directly referring to women, and those also in which women are made prominent by exclusion. As all such passages combined form but one-tenth of the scriptures, the undertaking will not be so laborious as, at the first thought, one would imagin. These texts, with the commentaries, can easily be compressed into a duodecimo volume of about four hundred pages.

II. The commentaries will be of a threefold character, the writers in the different branches selected according to their special aptitudes for the work:

1. Two or three Greek and Hebrew students would be required to devote themselvs to the translation and the meaning of particular words and texts in the original.

2. Others would devote themselvs to biblical history, old manuscripts, to the new version, and to the latest theories as to the occult meaning of certain texts and parables.

3. For the commentaries on the plain English version a committee of some twenty members would be necessary. These would be women of earnestness and liberal ideas, who would be quick to see the real purport of the Bible as regards their sex. Among them the various books of the Old and New Testaments would be distributed, making about three books to each member of the committee.

III. There will be two or more editors to bring the work of the various committees into one consistent whole.

IV. The completed work will be submitted to an advisory committee assembled at some central point, as London, New York, or Chicago, to sit in final judgment on the Woman's Bible.

And now, as to the manner of doing the practical work:

Those who hav been engaged this summer hav adopted the following plan, which may be suggestiv to new members of the committee. Each person purchased two Bibles, ran through them from Genesis to Revelations, marking all the texts that concerned women. The passages were cut out and pasted in a blank book, and the commentaries then written underneath. It is proposed to print the texts in fine type, and the comments, being the new part, in coarser type.

The large numbers of letters received, highly appreciativ of the undertaking, are very encouraging to those who hav inaugurated the movement, and indicate a growing self-respect and self-assertion in the women of this generation. But we hav the usual array of objectors to meet and answer. One correspondent conjures us to suspend the work, as it is "ridiculous" for "women to attempt the revision of the scriptures." I wonder if any man wrote to the late revising committee of divines to stop their work on the ground that it was ridiculous for men to revise the Bible. Why is it more ridiculous for women to protest against their present status in the Old and New Testaments, in the ordinances and disciplin of of the church, than in the statutes and constitutions of the state? Why is it more ridiculous to arraign ecclesiastics for their false teaching and acts of injustice to women than members of Congress and the House of Commons? Why is it more audacious to review Moses than Blackstone, the Jewish code of laws than the English system of jurisprudence? Women hav compelled their legislators in every state in the Union to so modify their statutes for women that the old common law is now almost a dead letter. Why not compel bishops and revising committees to modify their creeds and dogmas? Forty years ago it seemed as ridiculous to timid, time-serving, and retrograde folk for women to demand an expurgated edition of the laws as it now does to demand an expurgated edition of the liturgies and scriptures. Come, come, my conservativ friend, wipe the dew off your spectacles, and see that the world is moving. Whatever your views may be as to the importance of the proposed work, your political and social degradation are but an outgrowth of your status in the Bible. When you express your aversion, based on a blind feeling of reverence in which reason has no control, to the revision of the scriptures, you do but echo Cowper, who, when asked to read Paine's "Rights of Man," exclaimed, "No man shall convince me that I am improperly governed while I feel the contrary."

Others say it is not politic to rouse religious opposition. This much-lauded policy is but another word for cowardice. How can woman's position be changed from that of a subordinate to an equal without opposition, without the broadest discussion of all the questions involved in her present degradation? For so far-reaching and momentous a reform as her complete independence an entire revolution in all existing institutions is inevitable. When the individual development of woman occupies as large a place in social ethics as that of man, all fragmentary reforms will be subordinated to her education. Now the question of her freedom is ranked with many other questions of transient interest. The Prohibition devotee says, "Pray do not touch woman suffrage. We are just on the eve of securing a temperance amendment, and to bring her rights into consideration would set our reform back a century." Even some Free Religionists say, "Pray do not advocate woman suffrage. We would preserve the secular nature of our government; but women are dominated by the clergy, and would vote us back under the blue laws of the Puritans." Some of the advocates of suffrage, equally blind and narrow, say, "Do not touch Free Religion, Temperance, or any social questions on our platform; it would injure our cause beyond all remedy." So on through the whole range of reforms, the leaders in each believing their pet idea more important than all others put together, and that is to be carried by a kind of clap-trap that conceals from the eyes of statesmen all views of the case but the one they consider most politic to keep uppermost.

The first time I was invited to speak in England, I was quietly instructed beforehand to say nothing of the rights or wrongs of married women, nothing on the questions of marriage or divorce, nothing on the deceased wife's sister bill, nothing on the Bible, nothing on temperance or social purity. I could but compare my immaculate adviser to the Jungfrau, cold and serene in lofty contemplation of the rights of spinsters, her heads above the clouds, "touching nothing."

Let us remember that all reforms are interdependent, and that whatever is done to establish one principle on a solid basis strengthens all. Reformers who are always compromising hav not yet grasped the idea that truth is the only safe ground to stand upon. The object of an individual life is not to carry one fragmentary measure in human progress, but to utter the highest truth clearly seen in all directions, and thus to round out and perfect a well-balanced character. Was not the sum of influence exerted by John Stuart Mill on political, religious, and social questions far greater than that of any statesman or reformer who has sedulously limited his sympathies and activities to carrying one specific measure? We hav many women abundantly endowed with capabilities to understand and revise what men hav thus far written. But they are still suffering from inherited ideas of their inferiority; they do not perceive it, yet such is the true explanation of their solicitude lest they should seem to be too self-asserting. Let those women who fear ridicule, and suggest policy, try to imagin themselvs entirely free as men are free. Let them try to rise completely above the effects of former serfdom. If they can do this, they will then, and not till then, be capable of seeing the sycophancy of the opposition, be capable of judging the projects of unshackled minds.

Again there are some who write us that our work is a useless expenditure of force over a book that has lost its hold on the human mind. Most intelligent women, they say, regard it simply as the history of a rude people in a barbarous age, and hav no more reverence for the scriptures than any other work. So long as tens of thousands of Bibles are printed every year, and circulated over the whole habitable globe, and the masses in all English-speaking nations revere it as the word of God, it is vain to belittle its influence. The sentimental feelings we all hav for these things we were educated to believe sacred, do not readily yield to pure reason. I distinctly remember the shudder that passed over me on seeing a mother take our family Bible to make a high seat for her child at table. It seemed such a desecration. I was tempted to protest against its use for such a purpose, and this, too, long after my reason had repudiated its authority.

To women still believing in the plenary inspiration of the scriptures, we hav nothing to say. Our only claim to their attention is that we approach the subject in an earnest search after truth, and shall present to our readers incontrovertible facts.

ELIZABETH CADY STANTON.

Freethought in England.

IV.—FREETHOUGHT IN THE MAGAZINES.

There are only two avowedly Freethought magazines in England, viz., Progress and Our Corner. I put Progress first, because it is devoted exclusivly to the consideration of social, political, literary, and religious subjects from the point of view of the most advanced Freethought. A large portion of the space of Our Corner is devoted to the exposition of "Modern Socialism." Mr. Foote is the editor of the former magazine, and Mrs. Besant of the latter. Important as is the work accomplished by this literature in promoting general enlightenment and in removing the errors of superstition, it is, of course, small when compared with the vast amount of good achieved by the wide reading of such admirable monthlies as the Nineteenth Century, the Fortnightly Review, Knowledge, and other such magazines, which may now be found in the reading-rooms of most of the large workingmen's clubs and institutes throughout the length and breadth of the land.

The important discussions between Mr. W. H. Mallock and Frederic Harrison, and more recently the notable encounter between Professor Huxley, who stands at the head of English scientists, and Mr. Gladstone, the greatest of English statesmen, who is justly regarded as one of the most powerful rhetoricians and debaters of modern times—the discussion between these eminent men on the alleged agreement of Science with Genesis—to say nothing of such valuable contributions to it as those of Dr. Réville and Mrs. Lynn Linton—caused quite a sensation in this country, and had the effect of disturbing the religious faith of hundreds who had hitherto found no difficulty in reconciling the absurdities of the Mosaic narrativ with the stupendous verities of science.

The theologians could hav chosen no stronger representativ than Mr. Gladstone, who in the way of "hair splitting" is without an equal; and Freethinkers could hav had no worthier champion of their cause than Professor Huxley, for in addition to having a thorough knowledge of the physical sciences he is a philosopher of the highest order.

By an advertisment on the last page of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I find that your readers may judge for themselvs of the merits of the discussion in question by investing in a cheap work published at your office, and therefore I need only say that, in judging of the value of Mr. Gladstone's contributions, it must be remembered that his education, training, and indeed the whole of his surroundings, hav tended irresistibly toward the creation in his mind of a religious bias, against which, however, the sincerity of his nature and his desire to be perfectly just hav frequently compelled him to war, although he cannot quite rid himself of it. Nothing could hav been finer than to hear from his lips the magnificent oration he delivered in favor of intellectual liberty, when the question of the right of an Atheist, in the person of Mr. Bradlaugh, to take his seat was under consideration in the House of Commons.

For breadth of knowledge, ripe scholarship, subtlety of reasoning, eloquence of words, and vigor of declamation, it was admitted by all who heard it to be matchless. John Bright's speech had all the admirable qualities that famous orator displays on great occasions; but I heard Mr. Hopwood, Q.C., himself an accomplished speaker, remark that, when all the trained eloquence of the House seemed exhausted, Mr. Gladstone came forward and revealed his wisdom, erudition, and eloquence in a way that surpassed them all.

But to return to the magazines. Once a discussion is started in a monthly, it is not unusual for some of the provincial journals to take it up. It thenceforth becomes a subject for discussion among the masses. The clergy make sly references to it in their sermons. Freethought lecturers pronounce their opinion upon it. Ultimately the Young Men's Christian Association nibble around the subject, and so the ball is set merrily spinning.

Whatever happens, orthodox Christianity is the loser. In one magazine appears a series of articles on "The Origin of Man," and when the man of science has given his reasons for disbelieving in the theory of "special creation," and for believing in the evolution of man from lower forms, the religious party put forward their Rev. Pseudo-man-of-Science, who demonstrates, to his own satisfaction, that man is fearfully and wonderfully made, that no being short of a deity—about whom nobody knows anything, and theologians least of all—could hav manufactured him.

In another magazine a discussion is started on the question of the "Freedom of Man's Volition," which raises the important consideration of man's alleged responsibility to deity for his conduct. Some time ago Professor Tyndall wrote a paper for the Nineteenth Century, in which he denied the Christian doctrin of the freedom of the will, and affirmed that man's will was always determined by the strongest motiv in the mind in the view of the individual immediately antecedent to volition; that, consequently, men's actions were necessitated by the education, training, habits, or circumstances of the individual, and that praise and blame acted as motivs to influence or deter an individual from the performance of certain actions.

"If," said Professor Tyndall, in effect, "a thief were brought before a judge for the crime of felony, and said, 'My lord, it is true I stole the money in question, but I could not help it; I was necessitated to do it; the strongest motiv compelled me;' then the judge would answer: 'You are quite right, prisoner; the motiv of blame did no act upon your mind sufficiently. You stole because, under the set of circumstances in which you were placed, you couldn't help it. Society, through its representativ, now punishes you because it cannot help it—it is a question of self-defense.'"

Of course, a statement of this sort was very repugnant to the Christians, and they defended themselvs as best they could, though it was an exceedingly weak defense.

They found great difficulty in reconciling the doctrin of free will with that of predestination, which is undoubtedly also a tenet of their faith.

Since then, Mr. Justice Fitzjames Stephen, one of our most eminent judges, wrote an article in which he sought to demonstrate that the irreligious man was the most useful citizen; the man who devotes himself to the work of the world—the lawyer, the mechanic, the merchant, the judge, the author, and the laborer—these were the men who had promoted the advancement of civilization of the world.

Mr. Justice Stephen went as far as saying that it was the "nothingarian," not the religionist or the Freethinker, who was the most useful citizen.

Plenty of discussion followed. My own view of the matter was that you could not separate the merchant or the lawyer from his religion or irreligion, and that the best man in society to promote reform, as well as to do the work of the world, because of his earnestness and enthusiasm, is either the out-and-out religious man or the avowed Freethinker. The "Nothingarian" is the greatest impediment in the road of human advancement the reformer has to deal with.

Every man, however ignorant, has some theory of the universe—he believes in either the natural or the supernatural, and supernatural beliefs hav been found to obstruct human advancement. The duty of the reformer, therefore, consists in removing this last barrier from the path of progress.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Cruelty of Superstition.

The most conclusiv proof of the baleful tendency of dogmatic superstition has not, so far as my reading has extended, been demonstrated with sufficient clearness. I refer to the fact that a man cannot accept the conditions of salvation (as preached by most of the churches), without being necessarily converted into a persecuting fiend—that is, if he be at once sincere and logical. The mob howling around the martyr's pyre hav been universally, though not quite consistently, rated as imbruted devils. But let us be just to his tormentors, while compassionating the sufferer. The latter is as much the victim of his own obstinate belief—hardly less irrational than that of his executioners—as the latter are urged and guided by a (to them) self-evident duty. The offense may hav been a denial of the dogma of transubstantiation, while admitting that of the trinity! It is manifest that a very lively sympathy with either party is not possible to the liberal mind, especially in view of the probable action of the victim under a change of circumstances, who might then be found lighting the pile to consume the recusant who denied his trinity. And, in the cases supposed, each party would be right—if his religion were true.

Think of the torture of a human soul through endless time for the rejection of an article of faith, and then try to estimate the amount of endless misery which one heretic might occasion by weaning from the saving belief thousands of people! It thus requires but a very simple appeal to figures to justify the personæ of an auto-dâ-fé in their apparent cruelty. It is surely better that one heretic's body should die than that the souls of unnumbered thousands should suffer eternally—the thousands whom that heretic might hav inveigled into perdition. Thus the man who believes that there is "no salvation out of the church" is recreant to the highest duty that can actuate a human being if he does not destroy the man or the influence that would lead souls out of that church. This view will reveal the Romanists as the most consistent Christians of all ages; they hav practiced every art and severity to save souls.

The Protestant assertion of the right of private judgment would seem to forbid the saving methods of Rome, but see the sinister offset we confront in the latitude that necessarily results from the rule. It is not possible for the Protestant Christian to believe in the salvation of the pronounced unbeliever, and yet unbelief is not only the legitimate, but the inevitable outcome of the freedom he claims. While unable, under a rule of their own prescription, to bar the exercise of reason, the Protestants yet fetter it (beyond their own limitations) in every way possible. The oath of the skeptic is challenged in court, and an opprobrium is attached to his name intended as a temporal addition to his eternal fate. Indeed, it is the old, old story, freedom for ourselvs as far as we desire to go, and eternal damnation to all who go farther. Thus the two churches practically join issue, as against Freethought, the Catholic believing in "no salvation out of the church," and the Protestant consigning to hell all who hav used a larger amount of mental freedom than his own.

Thus, in this view, it is possible to lift the odium which misled humanity has carried for ages. Indeed, it is not difficult to conceive that those very immolators of the martyrs might, under other circumstances and in an advanced age, hav illustrated the most exalted type of devoted heroism in defense of a righteous cause. Yet something is to blame for the inhumanities of superstition. Who is it—the priest? Hardly, if he is sincerely convinced of the truth of what he preaches. In that case, he merges in the common humanity I am seeking to defend. However, considering his education and opportunities of research, it is hard to realize that every priest is a sincere believer in the monstrous absurdities he teaches; though a proper respect for the aggregate morality may require us to believe that mummers do exist who do verily believe that a cabalistic incantation transmutes a piece of dough into veritable human (or deific) flesh, to be forthwith mixed with bad whisky in the priestly duodenum! But these men, taken in time, could hav been made to believe in absurdities even grosser than that, if such extremes of dementia were possible. I do not see, as before intimated, how we can construe the actions of these sincere believers into moral blame. If they did not preach the doctrin they believe, and follow it out to its logical consequences, they would be morally derelict or intellectually impotent. Therefore, whatever enormities they may commit are committed in a (to them) good cause—and how can the best of us do better, in intent?

Having thus cleared the skirts of poor humanity from the odium of those bloody cruelties which smear every page of the church's history, and having intimated that the most ferocious among the bigots begotten and inspired by a degrading and murderous superstition were but so many misdirected truth-lovers, where shall we locate the blame for the desolating blight which all history bewails and over which priests and other missionaries of error hav gloated through so many ages? To my apprehension, as a Necessitarian, the source of all the woes which superstition has inflicted on a groping and groaning world is in the error itself. If this be so—if the most devoted hearts hav been warped to the service of a beastly cause—if a blind and unreasoning bigotry has usurped in the human mind the place which should hav been the throne of truth—the duty of the Liberal is surely plain enough. Let us assail the main citadel of the enemy—his Pandora's box of blind and cruel mischiefs in the shape of dogmas, fictions, inventions, which are simply degrading anachronisms in the light of this nineteenth century, when historical criticism and physical research hav so conclusivly shown how bald are the frauds and assumptions on which all religions are built. The authorities are extant with which to confound the sophist, to tame the zealot, and to illume the dark mind. If the task of unchaining the body of the slave was deemed so glorious, what shall be said of the work which aims to unmanacle the human mind? Can the godlike faculty of reason find a nobler use than this, or the attribute of benevolence a higher or more fruitful moral aim? What can transcend in service to mankind the labor that seeks to dispel mental gloom, and replace rancour and hate by a feeling of fellowship and love? These desiderata can be accomplished only by the extirpation of the errors inculcated by the priest, which, as I hav shown, are utterly incompatible with the freedom and brotherhood of man.

There is required no other argument against superstition than the fact last named. There is certainly no other argument so fatally cogent as against the priest.

Tobacco and Savages.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: During Mr. Denton's stay on the island of New Guinea he became exceedingly interested in its nativ populations, at least in such of them as he came in contact with, in the study of their character and habits; and in writing me from its fatal shores, only about four weeks before his death, he referred to them, and to the effect of missionary labor among them, as follows: "So far there has been no trouble with the nativs, nor do I think there is likely to be any. They are glad to see us, and to get the cloth, beads, salt, knives, and hatchets, and, more than all else, the tobacco, distributed among them. Like all savages, they are passionately fond of tobacco, which they smoke out of a great bamboo pipe, eighteen inches long and three inches in diameter. The missionary schooner, Ellen Gowan, brought over to New Guinea, at one trip, three tons of tobacco, and at another trip, two and one-quarter tons. This is the 'bread of life' which the reverend gentlemen missionaries are distributing among this people." We refused to allow the boys, our sons, to take tobacco with them to trade with the nativs. "And," he continued, "so far hatchets, beads, and salt hav answered our purpose very well."

In his diary he wrote: "Little dream these naked taro-eating people of the change that is coming to them. I can look ahead a few years and see the younger ones clad in cotton or linen, white as snow, and the women in flashing silks. Beautiful cottages with lovely gardens will take the place of these canetied, thatched shelters of to-day, and, as certainly as these, will come grog-shops, and reeling drunkards, and all the abominations that are the fruit of our superior knowledge and our remaining barbarism."

The discussion of the missionary question reminded me of these references, and thinking they may not prove altogether uninteresting to you, I venture to send them.

As long as we can maintain the right to think and to speak our thoughts without reserve, so long we are safe. I rejoice in the stand you hav taken against any and every form of gag-law. If we would preserve our own rights, we must maintain the equal rights of all others. True Liberty is no respecter of persons. The hovel and the throne are equally near and dear to her. Nor is there any safety for free institutions if any person, or any class of persons, may be denied the right of defending their own cause in open discussion of its merits.

Grateful that THE TRUTH SEEKER is so ably conducted, I am very sincerely yours,

E. M. F. DENTON.

Canadian Notes.

Once more the "king of terrors" has been among us. Our old friend and associate, R. B. Butland, after a long and painful illness, has "joined the innumerable caravan," and left another gap in the ranks of Canadian Secularists that may not soon be filled. He was one of the oldest members of the Toronto society, one of our earliest home lecturers, and perhaps the best read member of the institution.

As conductor of our science class, and with an almost inexhaustible store of knowledge, gained from many years of patient application and study, he has done work for Secularism that cannot be over-estimated, and left an influence behind that will never die.

Many of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will, no doubt, remember him as an occasional correspondent, and, previous to his illness, as conductor of "Canadian Notes."

The funeral, which took place last Sunday, under the auspices of the Toronto Secular Society, was largely attended by members of the society and many orthodox friends. President Algie delivered the funeral address at the house. It was composed largely of appropriate selections from the works of Colonel Ingersoll, and delivered extempore in a manner which evidently made a deep impression on some of the orthodox listeners, one of them afterward remarking to the writer that "it was the most beautiful language he had ever heard on such an occasion, and a service that no one could reasonably object to."

It had been arranged that Mr. Jury should read a short service at the grave, but on his attempting to do so, the superintendent of the grounds, with true Christian love and firmness, ordered his attendants to fill up the grave as quickly as possible, and, placing his hand on Mr. Jury's shoulder, told him that his orders were that there was to be no service there of any kind.

Friend Jury, who is nothing if not clear grit to the backbone, proposed to read the service in spite of them if the friends wished it, but not wishing to make trouble on such an occasion, the friends thought it best to quietly submit; and so in a silence, broken here and there by murmurs of indignation, Christianity had its little opportunity to vent its spite in death upon one whom they could not injure while living.

On Sunday evening, October 24th, Mr. Algie made his first appearance before a Toronto audience as a Freethought lecturer, taking for his subject "Our Schools and Churches," a subject which he is eminently qualified to deal with, and to which he did ample justice. He fully confirmed the opinion previously held by the Toronto friends of his ability for lecture work, and proved that with a little practice he will be able to "keep his end up" with the best of them. We hope to hav him with us again soon and often. KANUCK.

The Liberal Club.

The man who wears a badge-pin for a living did not attend the 421st regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club, but he is informed that the entertainment there offered was worth far more than the paltry five cents extorted at the door. There was present a large audience of people whose countenances beamed with the light of true goodness. Mr. King was there, as was also Captain Clark. Bold Duffield sat well in advance; the gas-light threw him in relief, and livened up his countenance like yellow mustard spread on beef. Mr. Duffield is an unpopular person with the members of the club. But we digress.

The question for consideration was the late unveiling of the statue of Liberty on Bedloe's Island; and after Mr. Wakeman had read the usual notices, he called young Dr. Foote to the chair, and proceeded to the discussion. The writer is indebted to the first secretary for all the details of the meeting.

Mr. Wakeman selected as his text the following thoughts from Matthew, a writer some time since deceased:

> The scribes and Pharisees sit in Moses's seat; all therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works; for they say, and do not. For they bind heavy burdens and grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's shoulders; but they themselvs will not move them with one of their fingers. But all their works they do for to be seen of men; and they make broad their phylacteries and enlarge the borders of their garments, and love the uppermost rooms at feasts, and the chief seats in the synagogs, and greetings in the markets, and to be called of men, Rabbi, rabbi.

This, the speaker held, was a true description of the men who presided at the unveiling of the statue. The chief orator of the day was William M. Evarts; the next was Chauncey M. Depew, the paid attorney of the colossal thief of America. Then the occasion was desecrated by prayer by a minister of the gospel, who dedicated the statue to almighty God. The singing of the long meter Doxology was likewise inappropriate. The only decent speech was President Cleveland's. Those who should hav been invited first were absent. Among these were veterans of the war, the mayor of New York, the working people, the agriculturists, the clubs, the artists, and the women. The only representativs of the common people were the firemen and the policemen. Mr. Wakeman said he did not suppose the committee meant to do wrong. The saddest reflection was that they didn't know any better.

Mr. Augustus Levy, following, said that the unveiling of the statue was of small moment compared with Henry George's vote of sixty-eight thousand.

Dr. Kinget's central thought was that people could hav no conception of true liberty while they imagined themselvs the serfs of a tyrant beyond the skies

Madam Delescluze censured the women who attended the unveiling ceremonies without an invitation. The madam could not understand why Liberals should object to a service of prayer.

Colonel Hinton thought the men who had charge of the occasion under discussion very appropriately represented the sort of "liberty" we now enjoy.

Dr. Caleb S. Weeks, the well-known hymnologist, referred to the premature unveiling of the statue, which cut in two the sentence composing the speech of Senator Evarts. It was typical of these times. The people are inaugurating liberty while the Pharisees are charming themselvs with their own warble, in blissful unconsciousness of what is taking place around them.

Captain Clark made a speech, the nature of which the secretary had unfortunately forgotten.

Mr. Levison said that at the third or fourth meeting of the Liberal Club he advanced the hypothesis that this earth is more than six thousand years of age, the scriptures being in error upon that point. At the time his statement was not accepted, but later developments hav discovered the fact that he had a prescient eye.

Mr. Wakeman, in closing the discussion, said he hoped the French people who gave us this statue of Liberty had not heard that almost in sight of the bronze figure where it now stands a man is indicted and awaiting trial for exercising the liberty of speech on the subject of religion. He hoped rather that they would be assured that there still exist in America a few people who cherish the principles for which Lafayette fought, and which Paine, Jefferson, and Franklin established on American soil.

There is no meeting of the club this week, but on Friday night everybody who usually attends the club is expected to go to the Congress of the Secular Union at Chickering Hall and hear Mr. Putnam. On which occasion, without doubt, all those on truth intent may here a large amount obtain, presented in a pleasing vein, and never spend a cent.

Dr. York Coming Home.

As my sojourn in the land of the emu and kangaroo is drawing to a close, and I am about to turn my face toward the home of the stars and stripes, I thought it proper to drop a few lines to say that, with all my labor and struggles in a strange country, I hav not forgotten THE TRUTH SEEKER and its readers; and although not glad to leave Australia, I am glad of the near prospect of setting foot upon a soil more highly blest with the daylight of civil liberty. Our flag never was so dear, and never so beautiful, as today, floating in southern skies over the office of our American consul.

I don't seem to like queens and blue-blooded paupers who ride, like a nightmare, the industries of the country in the name and pretense of government; but these English people are so highly conservativ that they never forget any old thing or learn anything new.

Americanism in the line of Freethought takes well here, though people still hold on to their old and barbarous methods of cooking food, which are little better than leaving it in the raw state. The American cook-stove and other appliances of comfort and convenience make slow headway with these colonial people. Yet they are moving slowly in the direction of general reform.

My success here in these colonies has been good, and far beyond my most sanguin expectations. My audiences hav been all that I could desire both in numbers and in intelligence. Four Sundays more will close my work in Brisbane, where I hav spoken for eight months with scarcely any abatement of audiences or interest; and although I had for about eight months very large audiences in Sydney, and fine success, I am more in love with these Queensland people. They are courteous, kind, and generous, and I shall feel sorry the day I bid them goodbye after my thirty-fifth lecture in Brisbane.

By the way, Eugene, the books we ordered of you hav come in good order, I think, though I hav not opened the packages yet, or compared them with the invoice, as I am waiting a little for my friend James Mitchel's return, when they will be delivered. I am glad to hav a few of D. M. Bennett's "Round the World" books read here, and the familiar sight of them brought back to me his face and form so bright and activ as he was when at my home in San Jose. I little thought then that he so soon would go hence and I be left. It did not look that way then. He and I both thought that I would be the one to go, as I was in poor health at that time; in fact, so ill I could hardly stand on my feet to speak at his reception. But such is life. Grand old man, he can never die in the seed sown by his hand, and each year let us build his monument higher in the minds of true and loving men and women for all the good he has done in breaking the shackles of slavery from many minds in America.

Eugene, my boy, the old TRUTH SEEKER is a most welcome and regular visitor. I hardly think I could hav remained here all this time without its cheerful pages. And your pictures—well, go right on, and do so more; and if it was not so far down here, and only a monthly mail, you would receive many subscribers from me, and I am supremely happy when the Boston Investigator and THE TRUTH SEEKER heave in sight each month. Long may they liv to be, as they are, the leading Freethought papers of the world.

I was right well pleased to read of my friend S. P. Putnam's work in Butte, Helena, and Bozeman, where I labored last in America. Do you know, somehow, I like the man Putnam? I hav never seen him, and yet there is a tie which draws and binds, and I hope to meet him when I come East, as I hope to do when I return. And, somehow, I hav a hankering to speak in Paine Hall, and strike hands with THE TRUTH SEEKER and Boston Investigator men.

Secular Freethought is growing rapidly in these colonies. Joseph Symes holds the fort in Melbourne, while Collins and the irrepressible Walker float the white banner of mental freedom from the battlements of Sydney.

I am sorry to say that George Chainey has not met with the success his syndicate anticipated. Theosophy seems to be too thin for these common-sense people.

I am to giv my farewell words in Brisbane on October 24th, and in Sydney on the 31st, and expect to sail for home on November 4th, but may stop over in Auckland one month, reaching San Jose about Christmas, and after a little rest, before starting on my contemplated tour of the Eastern cities, I hope to pay a visit to the friends on Puget Sound and in British Columbia.

In conclusion, let me say that if any of our American speakers hav an itching to try their hand in these colonies, they may safely rely upon this fact—that whoever can draw, and hold, an American audience, and do good, strong, radical work, will succeed here. They want facts, logic, magnetism, fire; and then, to make it blaze right well, humor sets the pile on fire. If they desire to make a little money, let them avoid all syndicates or Freethought brokers. The man who can't bring himself is not worth much for himself or profitable to anyone else.

It is reported here that our chief of the Freethought lance, Colonel Ingersoll, is out of health. I hope it is not true, and most sincerely hope he will be spared to us for many years, to blaze and burn in the majesty of his might, as every lecture and every month and year of his life is a nail in the orthodox coffin. Let the dead bury the dead, but let us help to build the temple of mental liberty, that they who come after us may enjoy the sunlight of freedom's brighter day. With many good wishes, I am

Yours for all truth, J. L. YORK.

Our London Letter.

The suggestion of certain bishops and leading churchmen to celebrate the queen's jubilee next year by building a church house at the public expense has not quite met with the reception anticipated. The idea seems to be to erect a parsons' club-house in London, where these individuals may meet to exchange views on religious subjects, and be able to partake of "light refreshment" in the intervals of their arduous labors. There are to be in the edifice sundry lecture-rooms; and pamphlets showing the beauty and usefulness of the Church of England are to be distributed from this center all over the country; and, as this church is the friend of the poor, as well as of the rich, all are expected to contribute something. The proposition has met with much opposition from the inferior clergy, who all deprecate it, considering that they will derive no advantage whatever, and will not even be allowed to enter the sacred portals. Letters hav been sent to the papers in shoals, the majority of them being in favor of applying the money that may be collected to the augmentation of curates' incomes, which are reported to be very small in the majority of cases. But when a salary of £200 per annum is said to be starvation wages, it would be just as well if such grumblers were reduced to a quarter that sum and hav to earn it. There are thousands, if not millions, of hardworking people who would consider themselvs rich on such an income, and these lazy loafers hav the impudence to complain. A parson is dear at any price, and it would be a far better way of celebrating next year by abolishing the clergy altogether.

Beecher should consider he has done well in this country, as the only clerical opponent he has met was Spurgeon, who has shown himself about the only consistent member of all the ministers who hav had anything to do with him. I don't know how they can support a man who looks upon the creation story as a fable, professing to believe in evolution, and laughs at the idea of hell, when it is their business to support such absurdities. Probably his occasional laudation of Jesus Christ amply compensates for his heresy in other respects, and then his popularity cannot be overlooked, and he answers the purpose of a good advertisment for any chapel or hall where he lectures. If there is a chance of making a good collection such trifles as repudiation of the fundamental points of Christianity are not held as stumbling-blocks. As long as the almighty god Mammon is not blasphemed, it does not much matter about the other members of the Pantheon. One can easily imagin how Beecher and his clerical friends chuckle to themselvs when they are counting up the result of the evening's takings.

Within the past few days there hav been recorded three or four cases of suicide resulting from religious mania, but as these are of such common occurrence many of them are not considered of sufficient importance to publish. Of course the autumn assizes hav furnished the usual quota of pious criminals, and it is satisfactory to find that these rogues are not treated quite so leniently as was at one time the case. Dublin is quite excited over the exposure of a released convict who has been officiating in various places as a properly ordained priest, Dublin being the last scene of his exploits. It appears that he was a very successful preacher, and it does seem strange that there should be so little difference between those who are inspired by the Holy Ghost and properly anointed, and those who are not, that it is impossible for anyone, even an archbishop, to detect an interloper into the fold. The only crimes he appears to hav committed are that he has been practicing parsonry without a proper certificate, and omitting to pay his debts; but this latter is not a very unclerical offense, and doubtless helped to deceive the elect as to his real position.

A curious case was tried the other day. It seems that a wedding was arranged, but the bride did not turn up at the proper time, so, sooner than disappoint the guests, the groom suggested that a friend of the parties should take her place, which was accordingly done; but as the principal did not notify that the bride had been changed, a prosecution was instituted, and the unfortunate benedict, after a severe lecture on his wickedness by the judge, was sentenced to a term of imprisonment, the wife being also punished in a lesser degree. Now, I hav read the case several times, and cannot possibly make out what crime was committed, or who injured, by one girl being married in another's name, and can only conclude that it must hav been accounted a crime because the parson only collected a fee for one attendance, whereas he considered he ought to hav received double pay. Call for the Tenth Annual Congress.

To the Auxiliary Secular Unions and to all Citizens of the United States and Canadas who support the Nine Demands of Liberalism:

You are invited to attend the Tenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, to be held in New York city, at Chickering Hall, Fifth avenue and 18th street, on November 11th, 12th, and 13th, and also on Sunday evening, the 14th, an address by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, which concludes the Congress.

Pursuant to a vote of the last Congress, notice is hereby given that the following amendments to the constitution of the Union will be acted upon: 1. To reduce the fee for life-membership from $25 to $10. 2. Or, on payment of $10 by applicant for membership, to authorize the secretary to issue ten-year membership certificates, with all the privileges of life-membership during that time. 3. Whenever a man or woman has taken out annual membership certificates for three or five consecutiv years, such person thereafter on payment of annual-membership fee to possess the privilege of life-membership.

The Congress will also be called upon to consider measures for carrying on the work of Freethought, and securing the adoption of such laws by the various state governments and by the national government, as shall make the United States thoroughly Secular, and the repeal of all laws now on the statute-books which conflict with the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

Local auxiliary Unions are entitled by the Union constitution to five representativs in the Congress—the president and secretary and three delegates. All charter-members and life-members, all vice-presidents, all chairmen of state executiv committees, are entitled to seats and votes in the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats but not votes, except by permission of the Congress.

It is hoped that every auxiliary Union will send a full delegation to the Congress, and that every Freethinker in the United States and Canada, who can, will be present.

Per order of board of directors:

R. G. INGERSOLL, President.
SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Secretary.
COURTLANDT PALMER, Treasurer.

An Appeal to Liberals.

It is absolutely necessary to the success of the coming Congress that its sessions should be free. We want full houses and ample reports. We want to make as grand and permanent impression on the public mind as possible. This Congress is of national importance. What is done here will be felt for years to come. It will giv us a mighty impulse or it will be simply disaster, and everyone who wishes organized Freethought to triumph must lend a hand. We must hav the sinews of war. We must raise money for the expenses of this Congress by private subscription. We want to make no appeals to the Congress in session nor take up any collections.

The expenses will be as follows: Hall rent, $375; speakers, $175; advertising and incidental, $100; total, $650. This amount ought to be raised by the Liberals of the country before the meeting. Whether one comes or not to the Congress he feels an interest in its success, for no matter where he livs, how distantly, he will receive its benefit, its wealth of thought, and new influence for that which is dearest to his own mind. So I ask every Liberal to giv what he can—a dollar, or five dollars, or more, as his circumstances will allow. The amount can be easily raised if every Liberal will do his part. I also ask every Liberal society, if it cannot send delegates, to send some money. That is the next best thing. That will help. Every society will be helped by the Congress, and so we ask its fraternal aid. The following generous contributions already made ought to stir every Liberal to be equally as magnanimous according to his ability. I hope for an immediate response, and that by next week I can report the full amount raised:

Home News from Abroad!

From the Boston Index.

The American Secular Union, formerly known as the National Liberal League, will hold its Tenth Annual Congress at Chickering Hall, New York city, on November 11th, 12th, 13th, and 14th. It is now pretty well understood by intelligent Liberals generally that this "Union," since its new departure two years ago, has been "run" wholly in the interests of a New York clique. This is common talk among Liberal editors and lecturers, who, however, are cautious about publicly stating the truth on the subject, preferring, under the circumstances, the policy of silence. The leaders of this "Union" shrewdly manage to keep Colonel Ingersoll's name at the head of their list of officers, and use it both to giv themselvs importance and to intimidate any who are disposed to criticise the methods or the work of the aforesaid clique.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE supper of the Free Religious Association, in the Meionaon, 88 Tremont st., Boston, will begin at 6:30 P.M., on Thursday, Nov. 18th. There will be good music and speeches after 8 P.M., from Prof. Thomas Davidson, Col. T. W. Higginson, and other advanced thinkers. Reserved seats, $1, at the offices of the Index and the Woman's Journal, also at Ditson's, 451 Washington street. Admittance to gallery, 50 cents. All interested are invited cordially. F. M. Holland, secretary F. R. A.

THE efforts of Messrs. Pionnie and Marshall, of the Newark, N. J., Secular Union, meet with just reward. They hav succeeded in awakening interest among the people, and securing very large attendance at the weekly meetings of the society. On Sunday afternoon, the 7th inst., the hall was crowded. Mr. Reynolds writes: "Although the air of New Jersey is not generally, by my friends, deemed promotiv of my general health, on account of the fidelity of Jersey Christians to their principles—to love their enemies—nevertheless I felt it a duty to do all in my power to aid the noble band of workers for Freethought in Newark, and so ventured into the land of the Philistines. We had a most pleasant visit at the home of good Brother Pionnie, and at 3 P.M., repairing to the hall, found it filled with a most intelligent audience, who listened with pleased attention to my lecture on 'The Bible, Whence it Came and What it Really Teaches.' I sold about thirty copies of 'Blasphemy and the Bible,' and could hav sold twice as many more if we had had them." Mr. L. K. Washburn is the attraction for next Sunday afternoon, and thus a large and delighted audience is assured.

Mr. Remsburg has been obliged to decline all calls for lectures west of Indiana during this tour. Calls for lectures hav been received from the following towns, which he will also be unable to answer: Houlton, Me.; Fairfield, Me.; Saco, Me.; Lowell, Vt.; Eden Mills, Vt.; Port Jervis, N. Y.; Osceola, Pa.; Center Belpre, O.; Kent, O.; McConnellsville, O.; Baltimore, Md.

Roman Catholic Education.

From the New York Star.

Three apparently bright young men totally failed in their civil service examinations for positions in the Custom House last week. The young men now lay their failure to the fact that they did not attend the public schools, but, being Catholics, they attended private Catholic schools, where they were not taught thoroughly. One candidate who failed, a Mr. McCullough, was very indignant. When I asked him if he blamed the civil service examiners, he said:

"No, sir; I do not. I blame my parents for taking me out of our splendid public schools, where everything is taught through the normal school system, and where all the teachers are normal school graduates, and sending me to a school where I was taught more religion than geography."

"Then you do not think the average Catholic church school is as good a place for a boy to get an education in as our regular American public school?" I inquired.

"Certainly I do not. I shall henceforth send my children to the New York public schools. I am a Catholic, but I am not willing to cripple my children as I hav been crippled. If I had gone to our public schools, I would now be in the Custom House at $1,600 per year. Instead I failed in my examination, and I go back to a menial place where I only make $600. No boy who graduates at the average Catholic school, where they hav old-fashioned books, old-fashioned systems, and solemn and shallow teachers, will be able to pass these civil service examinations. We Catholics are hurting ourselvs. We are laming our children. We are keeping ourselvs in the mud through ignorance when we could go to the public schools without money and without price, and fit ourselvs to cope with the rest of the world. If we want to take a place among educated Americans, we must quit all nonsense and go to American schools and colleges."

Mr. Bowman's Epigrams.

Some think it is worse to go for the doctor on Sunday than to kill a man on Monday.

Some people think that the human race slowly came up from the Presbyterians.

It is our opinion out West that Christ was nothing more than a good, square republican.

Communications.

The "Post-Mortem" Issue at Des Moines.

Doubtless the most important era in the history of orthodox theology occurred, but a few weeks since, at Des Moines, Ia. This was in connection with the meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. It seems that for a year past Rev. Mr. Hume, one of the most scholarly and successful of missionaries, has not been returned by the committee to his foreign field. With him and his many friends the question is, Why? In a meeting held about a year since, at Andover, the Congregational Mecca of heresy, Mr. Hume let it inadvertently slip out that post-mortem mercy is a growing hope with him and other missionaries and ministers. It seems that a happy, hopeful influx from the spiritual spheres is flowing into some of the orthodox. The prudential committee, doubtless overburdened with a stock of prudence, failed to recommend his return. Other good, learned, and progressiv men applied for appointments as missionaries. But because they hoped for future mercy to the "heathen" and the rest of "non-elect" humanity, their petitions hav been treated with a most significant silence.

The advocates of the new departure, among whom are the two brothers Smyth, one a professor in Andover, are men of undoubtedly high standing and rare ability. Ten years ago Prof. Edgar Smyth was rigidly orthodox. He believed in, and taught, eternal damnation for somebody else. Fortunately for him, this period of reflection has rendered him a more humane man. Since he would not like to be eternally damned himself, he practically applies the golden rule in not desiring the damnation of others. The way in which he goes about this is, not to force people to enter heaven through fear of hell, but to destroy hell, the work of the "devil." We mean no reflection on the "majority." He would demolish the "lower house," then surely there will be no place or prison for moral delinquents.

Besides, if these broader men who are heterodox on the hell issue are not good and safe enough to preach to "heathen" of the orient, why let them preach to occidental Christians? Are not we Americans just as good as "the heathen Chinee?"

The most unfavorable feature of post-mortem eternal damnation, and which stamps it with a nature akin to vindictiv savagery on the part of those advocating it, is that they want it for somebody besides themselvs. If its exponents would simply state that eternal damnation is a moral necessity to them, and their strongest incentiv to well-doing, we should be thoroughly satisfied of their honesty. But to impose it upon others as of equal necessity is both irrational and uncharitable. They frankly confess that if there is a hope of probation beyond what is termed "death," there is no use for missionaries to the heathen. The primal motiv for prosecuting foreign missions is here conceded to be, not a desire to render the "heathen" wiser and better, thus leaving them to take their chances; but, through the incentiv of fear, fostered by the horrible teaching of eternal damnation, to compel them to yield to ecclesiastical authority.

Another consideration, probably the more potent just now, is the lucre lever. The home churches raise annually about $560,000 which they know not how to squander, unless they send it to the "heathen" through the leakage of numerous missionary agents. If they do not cling with a deathlike grip to the time-honored superstition in question, this handsome sum will not be subscribed; or, if collected, will go mainly to the Presbyterians, among whom is a solidarity on the hell issue.

Since they think the Bible is not definit on this mooted question of post-mortem probation, unless it grants the much "larger hope" to the members of the new departure, common humanity solves this and similar problems. The added light of spirit communications makes assurance doubly sure. "The light lighteth every man that cometh into the world," either in this or some future world. Otherwise the Bible is not true. On this, we much prefer the rational statement of the Bible. Jesus "tasted death for every man," heathen and Christian alike. Suppose we work out this rich vein of Bible thought. Ask any man or woman of intelligence and humane feeling, Were it in your power, would you abolish eternal damnation and inaugurate probation after dissolution? The answer would be a most emphatic, Yes. Will an all-wise, good being do less?

> How can it be that Brahm
> Would make a world and keep it miserable?
> Since, if all powerful, he leaves it so,
> He is not good; and, if not powerful,
> He is not God.

Is not this heathen god superior to the Christian deity? And since, as Prof. Max Mueller holds, the god-idea at any specific period is the result of mental evolution, does not this conception of Brahm show that his devotee possesses a higher moral character than the Christian who desires to convert him downwards?

Would an affectionate parent rejoice to torture through all eternity his own child, when it is in his power to do otherwise? Will Brahm do less to his rational creatures than a man? This beautiful humanitarian view as a nobler inflowing from spirit realms, now rising to the surface of the turbid Congregational waters, creates no little commotion. It is useless to prophesy respecting its rosy future. The great, deep heart of humanity, having lovingly adopted it, will see its triumph through the crucible of test.

It looks very much as though the enviable mission of enlightening and liberalizing the orthodox wing of the church had indeed been committed directly to the Congregational body. We hoped that it would hav proved equal to its exalted calling. But alas! For them to hav extinguished the flames of hell would hav been equivalent to quenching Christian enthusiasm for saving the souls of heathen. It would hav killed out the money-loving and money-getting spirit in the church, perhaps! ZOATOPSIS.

Twin Relics.

During the last twenty-five years much has been said about the "twin relics of barbarism." Slavery and polygamy are the relics which hav received unqualified denunciation. The very contemplation of human (physical) slavery is now abhorrent to a very large majority of the inhabitants of North America, and polygamy is exceedingly repulsiv to the normal feelings of civilized people. Slavery and polygamy are, indeed, twin relics of barbarism, but they are not the only relics.

The American Board of Foreign Missions, after due deliberation, has decided that death ends probation; that "dangerous heresy" lurks in the bosom of the preacher who is inclined to admit that a heathen may possibly repent after death, and eventually breathe an atmosphere a little cooler than burning brimstone. And secondly, that no one can be saved who has not accepted Christ.

Aside from the colossal absurdity of such a decision, uttered in this day of the world, and by a convention of men professedly intelligent, it is the very quintessence of diabolism. No fiend of Pluto's regions could ever conceive a doctrin more revolting, more shockingly cruel, more infamously unjust.

Now, let us briefly notice the late notable judicial proceeding in Chicago. To discover the spirit that animated the prosecution in the trial of the Anarchists it is not necessary to reëxamin the whole mass of evidence and carefully weigh the words of each witness. It is only necessary to observe the remarks of Judge Gary himself, before pronouncing the sentence. I giv a brief extract: "Upon the question whether the defendants or any of them did anticipate or expect the throwing of the bomb, he said that it was a question not necessary to consider, because the instructions to the jury did not go upon that ground, but upon the ground that they had generally, by speech and print, advised a large class to commit murder, and had left the occasion, time, and place to the individual will, whim, and caprice of the individuals so advised, and that in consequence of that advice, and in pursuance of it, and influenced by it, somebody not known did throw the bomb. The crime was nothing less than murder," etc. What a monstrous assumption! Are we living in a republic? Without stopping to argue the question whether the defendants did or did not, as Judge Gary says, "advise a large class to commit murder," I want to ask how he knows that an unknown person was influenced in a certain way, or by certain means! It is improbable that any person of ordinary intelligence has lived in Chicago for the last two years without hearing some of the speeches, or reading some of the articles, of the Anarchists, but to assume as a positiv fact that a certain murder must hav been committed by a person influenced thereto by the utterances of a few specified persons, and, on that hypothesis, to proceed to take the lives of those specified persons, is, to use the judge's own words, nothing less than murder. For all Judge Gary knows, the bomb-thrower may hav been a person who never heard a word nor read a line uttered by any one of the defendants. The principle enunciated in the above-quoted paragraph is the most unspeakably inhuman, ferocious, damnable principle that ever blotted the record of American jurisprudence. I call upon every lover of liberty, every man and woman who respects the Constitution of the United States, to denounce, suppress, deny, and defy that doctrin. It is a direct menace to free institutions, and has no place among a civilized and progressiv people. But this is not all, nor the worst. The promulgation of such a doctrin, from such a source, sanctioned by the authorities, will do more to create, intensify, and spread Anarchistic sentiment than all the speeches and writings of all the Anarchists and Socialists that hav ever entered Chicago. I hav no sympathy with crime, but when I see rank injustice pervading our courts, high and low, and a gang of parasites living off the labor of others, the time seems to hav arrived when the emblems of liberty should be prostrated, and the scales of Themis be broken. Our so-called Christianity and law, of the Gary stamp, are twin relics of barbarism.

N. G. W.

Charles Watts's Work.

During the months of September and October I hav given forty lectures, and traveled nearly four thousand miles. Among the places I hav visited are the following: Toronto and Hamilton, in Canada; Philadelphia, Pa.; Mount Holly, N. J.; Waynesburg, Pa.; Grand Rapids, Muskegon, Lowell, Hastings, and Kalamazoo, Mich.; Chicago and Wyoming, Ill., and Neillsville, Wis. In all those towns the elements for Secular propagandism are numerous, but in many of them organization is sadly defectiv. There is too great a lack of coöperation among Freethinkers, except when a Liberal lecturer visits their respectiv localities. The coming Congress in New York should stimulate more united action. Lecturing should be regarded as the precursor of consolidating the results of platform work.

In Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, organized efforts hav done much, and considerable more could be done if all who profess Secular principles in these hives of mental activity would perform their fair share of duty in conducting the affairs of the local societies. Apart from the injustice of allowing such labor to fall upon one or two, there is the evil that in the event of sickness or private business calling them away from the society for a time the advocacy of the cause is made thereby to suffer. Those who hav been emancipated from the slavery of superstition should resolve to do something toward freeing their fellows who are still in captivity. Mental indolence and disregard for the freedom and welfare of others are violations of the great teachings of practical Secularism. The true man livs not simply for his own comfort, but for the happiness and well-being of society in general. This is the very essence of Secular philosophy.

The beneficial results of adopting this principle are manifest in Grand Rapids, Mich., where, through the Secular benevolence and activ service to the cause of Mr. D. A. Blodgett, Secularism has won a position in the public estimation which is as gratifying to every Liberal as it is serviceable to intellectual freedom. Mr. Blodgett has set a noble example in striving to organize Freethought ideas, not only in his own town, but also in surrounding districts, and, no doubt, Michigan will ere long be the center of a great Secular propagandism. At all my recent lectures throughout the state I had crowded audiences, which increased nightly. Lucius C. West, of Kalamazoo, who has so ably contributed for years past to Secular literature, is now arranging an extensiv tour in the Northwest for me to commence in January.

The gatherings at Chicago were not so large as one might expect, judging from the number of Freethinkers there are in the city. But for the persistent activity of Mr. and Mrs. Freeman and Mr. Stevens, very little would be heard of Secular work in Chicago. I found great excitement caused by the late verdict and condemnation to death of the Anarchists. I am no believer in Anarchy, for, in my opinion, it is wrong as a principle and foolish as a policy. Nevertheless, I protest against the sentence passed upon the men in Chicago. That sentence was not the result of a fair and impartial trial, but rather the outcome of the fever of prejudice and the passion of revenge. If those men hav committed an error, to hang them is not the best method to achieve their reformation. Such a mode of "punishment" is a brutal legacy of a barbarous past, which the symbol of the cross has failed to destroy. I am no friend to any kind of physical revolution, or resort to violence to obtain reforms. This kind of advocacy might hav been justifiable in days gone by, but now we hav better weapons with which to fight our social and political battles. With the aid of the press, the pen, the platform, and the ballot-box we can conduct a more useful and dignified conflict than can ever be carried on in the throes of violent physical force agitation.

Through the efforts of those well-tried Liberals, Messrs. Bailey and Cox, of Wyoming, Ill., some useful work has been done in this hot-bed of orthodoxy. I recently lectured there three nights to good and attentiv audiences. Threatenings of personal violence were hurled at me, and attempts were made to interfere with the order of the meetings, but, through the precautions of our friends, all efforts at disturbance were nipped in the bud.

I had a very pleasant time at Neillsville, Wis., where I spoke three times to audiences that increased in numbers each meeting. Mr. R. Dewhurst, of the Neillsville bank, is a genuin specimen of a fine old English gentleman, although, perhaps, his excellent qualities hav been developed during the thirty years he has resided in this country. In him and his charming family Secularism has warm friends and practical exponents. The local press gave very flattering notices of my lectures, and so successful were they that arrangements were at once made for me to giv another course in January next.

All friends in the West or Northwest requiring lectures early in the new year will please forward their applications as soon as possible to Lucius C. West, 105 East Main street, Kalamazoo, Mich.

CHARLES WATTS.

J. L. Andrew in the East.

Since New Jersey has become noted for arrests for blasphemy, the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will, perhaps, be interested in the general condition of Freethought in that state. The first appointment for me to lecture in that state was Boonton, the city that two generations ago was noted for its noble advocacy of abolition, and recently for the arrest of Mr. Reynolds. I gave three lectures there. The audiences gave very respectful attention, although it was whispered that another arrest would follow the lectures. I am not very easily terrified by religious threats, so it made no impression on me. Each of the lectures was attended by a fair sprinkling of Catholics, who manifested much interest. Perhaps the Christians were afraid to hav more than one blasphemy case at a time. As an offset to what I had said on the influence of Christianity on human conduct, the editor of the Bulletin inserted a story in his paper concerning a rich Infidel whose fears of being robbed were allayed by his host reading the Bible and praying before retiring. The effect on the Infidel was such that he soon after renounced his unbelief and became a Christian. This is a Sunday-school story, taken from a Sunday-school paper. The lesson was that Infidels are wrong in robbing society of those influences that restrain men from crime, and that religion makes men good. After what had happened, when Mr. Reynolds was insulted and arrested, and one of the oldest and most respected citizens was threatened with a "ducking" in the canal by the most religious people of the place, I do not see how the editor could boast of the restraining influence of religion.

From Boonton I went to Newark, where arrangements were made for two lectures. Newark has one of the most interesting societies it has ever been my pleasure to address. And I think I may say that I hav never addressed a more intelligent audience than the one in that city. A most amicable feeling seems to prevail among even those of the most extreme views. It is unnecessary to say that no Liberal society can be prosperous where there is a feeling of intolerance toward those who happen to differ with us.

Jobstown was the next place where arrangements were made for lectures. Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds hav lectured there, and the few live Liberals in that village hav shown their zeal and intelligence by purchasing a library that is an honor to the place. The actual worth of the library is not less than one hundred dollars. While the element of sociability is indispensable in our work, we cannot too strongly advocate the use of the best literature. The cause of Liberalism is preëminently the cause of intelligence, of science, of humanity, and we cannot too highly esteem the perusal of advanced literature. One of the greatest impediments in our work comes from the supposition that Infidelity consists simply in theological refutation rather than in that building up of the individual and of society that is caused only by lofty thinking and deep feeling. The Liberalism that is satisfied with theological dispute is destined to be short-lived. The great demand of the age is for something that satisfies the unbiased intelligence of man, and nothing can more successfully meet this demand than literature and science.

From Jobstown I went to Vineland, where the Unitarian church was secured for the lecture on "Liberty and Law." Many years ago Vineland was one of the strongholds of Liberalism. But now it is a fossil. Two causes hav brought about this state of things—emigration and dissension. It is very difficult for a Liberal speaker to get a good audience in that city. About fifty persons assembled to hear the lecture. One of the editors noticed it by saying that "the speaker handled his subject with considerable ingenuity."

I next lectured before the Friendship Liberal League of Philadelphia, one of the most reliable Leagues in the country. The first lecture called forth considerable discussion, as it was in relation to the jurisdiction of civil government. One or two favored Anarchy, and the rest pleaded for some form or other of authority. For my own part, I hav never yet seen any principle by which Anarchy could be justified. Just as surely as the law of cohesion exists in all matter, so does the law of government exist in all mankind. And our highest aim consists, not in attempting to destroy governmental authority, but the abuses which hav surrounded it, and thus insure protection to all.

For the last three years I hav been carefully observing the condition of Liberalism throughout the country, the causes of its comparativ non-success, and what might probably be conduciv to its permanent prosperity. It seems to me that the most successful method of collecting all our forces and using them to the best advantage is to hold conventions in those states that are strong enough to support them. I suggested this to the Liberals in New Jersey, and the plan was commended by all those to whom I spoke concerning it. I suggested that a convention be held in a city where there is a Liberal society, and Liberals from all over the state attend and devise plans for the dissemination of Liberal ideas. I hope that the Freethinkers of New Jersey will agitate this and arrange for a successful convention next year. Pennsylvania has already adopted this plan, and with wise management will be successful. There are only three states in the West where I think it is possible at present to carry out such a plan. These states are Kansas, Illinois, and Iowa. There are thousands of well-to-do, activ Liberals in each of these states, and if they would agitate the question and coöperate for its success they could soon effect decided changes in their respectiv communities. It is too late to attempt any such thing for this year, but there is ample time to create an interest and accomplish the desired object for the next and succeeding years. When we remember that all religious bodies hold their conferences, etc., and that through such means their body is strong and effectiv, it surely should be an inducement to us as Liberals to adopt similar plans for the attainment of our purposes. The haphazard plan by which the great principles of freedom and of science are made known to the people by the Liberal party of America is a proof of either a lack of true coöperativ purpose or of true executiv ability. When we realize that Liberalism is synonymous with all civilization and advancment; that it includes whatever is grand or great in human life, then, perhaps, there will be a proper awakening to the duties of the hour and an appreciation of our opportunity.

J. L. ANDREW.

Ft. Scott, Kan.

W. S. Bell in Texas.

I hav been nearly a month in this state, and hav been as busy as my health would permit. They hav a disease down here called the dengue, which is a terrible nuisance, as one does not get credit for being ill when he feels worse, probably, than Job did when covered with boils.

My first lecture was given in Dallas before the Secular society of that place. The meeting was held in the Opera House, the best place in the city. Among the most prominent and activ Liberals of this city are Messrs. Geo. Cretien, John Jackson, H. B. Bristol, Dr. McKay, G. W. Fleming, Allen Johnson, W. J. Johnson, and Alfred B. Westrup.

From Dallas I went to Waco, the home of J. D. Shaw, whom I met, with many others of the same stripe there. Mr. Shaw has a good following here, if it be proper to say that Liberals follow anyone. Everybody that reads THE TRUTH SEEKER knows something about the Waco Liberal Hall. The Freethinkers of that place hav occasion to be proud of their hall. Mr. Shaw givs a lecture every Sunday evening to a large, attentiv, and intelligent audience. I had the pleasure of addressing his society one evening during my short stay in the city. At Temple I was prostrated with the dengue, but did not giv up my lecture there. Mr. Shaw came down to see the town and talk up the interests of the Independent Pulpit. It was a good thing for me and those who came out to hear me, for I had to cut short my talk and call upon him, as I found myself scarcely able to stand up. I was kindly entertained here by J. B. Nunnally and wife, who did all they could to alleviate my pains and aches. I made the acquaintance of Mr. Ford and wife and other good Liberals. Dr. L. J. Russell, of Heidenheimer, introduced me to the audience. It will be remembered that in 1875 he was decoyed from his house and whipped by masked men, because he was an Infidel. But the day for whipping Infidels is past in this state. Liberal views are spreading very rapidly all over the country.

From Temple I went to Belton, and had the pleasure of talking to a splendid audience. I made the acquaintance there of Dr. Talley, A. J. McDaniel, Henry Clay Smith, and many others. A good Liberal society can easily be established here if some will go ahead and get it started.

My next place was Norse, where I gave two lectures to full houses. T. Theo. Colwick is the most activ Liberal in this region. He met me at Clifton, eight miles from Norse, and brought me over the rough country in the night, getting lost once or twice before we reached the lone light in the lone store at Norse. I was introduced to Mr. E. A. Rolen and Mrs. E. H. Rolen, his mother, a lady of most pronounced Liberal character. My short stay was made very pleasant in this family. Mrs. Rolen has been an invalid for years. She says a good God would not keep her in pain so long, and if she could get redress she would sue him for damage.

Mr. Colwick took us in his carriage from Norse to Meridian, a distance of twelve miles, over as rough a country as I hav seen anywhere in Texas. I spoke in the school-house at Meridian to a hastily collected audience, and was entertained by Judge Greer and family. Next day, Sunday, October 24th, Mr. Colwick carried me eight miles further, to Morgan, where I was advertised to lecture in the evening, but a heavy storm coming up just at the time we were about to go to the hall, the lecture was postponed. The activ workers in the Liberal ranks here are Moses Miller, Mr. Paschal, Hiram Snodgrass, Mr. Erickson, and Dr. Bateman.

At Walnut Springs I had a very large audience. The orthodox turned out strong, and after I had finished my lecture they called upon a young man who is underwitted and who had quite recently been released from jail, where he had been on the charge of horse-stealing. I made no reply to the rowdyish tumult that his speech created. If orthodoxy is content to set up as its representativ an idiot and horse-thief, I suppose I shall hav to submit.

About the first of December I shall visit Wichita, Kansas, and probably remain several weeks, giving Sunday lectures under the auspices of the Secular Union.

Mixed Pickles.

A Milwaukee pulpiteer opened his mouth a few Sundays ago and astounded the world and the rest of mankind with the utterance of words of rare wisdom that floated out from his lips. With a sudden and inspired burst, so to speak, he told his astonished hearers that "all things work together for the good of them that polarize toward the totality of things." And here the world has been working its axis and having revolutions and things for millions of years, and this is the first we hav heard how "things work together for the good" of certain persons, and had to learn it from a Milwaukee pulpiteer. Why couldn't this thing hav been known thousands of years ago? Why—but there—why mourn over the was not when we hav the is? Sufficient unto the evil of the was not is the is of the now, as I look at it; and if the reader doesn't understand this proposition he is more obfuscated than the writer, who, however, suspects there may be more in it than he could dream of in his philosophy.

"The earth is fairly breaking out with oil wells," was an editorial line in one of our papers the other day. A day or two later a correspondent bobs up serenely and wants said paper to "admonish the inhabitants of the earth to prepare for the end," saying that the "oil wells breaking forth all over the earth signify the final burning according to the prophecy," when all things will be done brown, of course. He signs himself "R. S."—Really Scared, probably—but I say to the people in general, don't get scared yourselvs, for there is no danger with the Standard Oil Co. doing business at the old stand. This great absorbing, monopolistic cormorant will gather all this oil in long before enough collects in any one spot to warrant touching off for the grand and universal conflagation, prophesied by some pot-bellied priest of old, who never dreamed of the great absorber, the S. O. Co.

Some woman (name forgotten), writes to the World to say that New York and Brooklyn are soon to catch a quake beside which the Charleston affair will rank as a very small potato, which the Lord has arranged to bring about in order to rally the sinful inhabitants of said cities around his flag of righteousness, which rally nothing short of an earthquake will precipitate, it would appear. This woman has got the "tip," I suppose, and the sinners of the cities named had better stand from under—in fact, had better go to camping-out at once. It will be a bang-up quake, no doubt, and if the sinners and goodies do not all go to camping-out, thousands upon thousands of lives will be lost in horrible slaughter, which, from Bible accounts, the Lord is equal to inflicting on the creatures he made (?). As quakes are no respecters of persons, it is not unlikely that many of the godly will be caught in the first shock of matter and wreck of cities with the ungodly, which would seem to be rough on their kind. However, as they are booked for "glory," they will be all right, albeit the manner of their taking off will be sudden and unpleasant. But how about the slaughter of the ungodly? They will go to the "pit," of course, while a very much larger number of their kind, who shall escape the crash, will be booked for immortal joys, having been warned by the quake to seek the heavenly "cover." How beautifully fair is this in an eminently just God! He kills half the population of a city that he may gather in, through fear, the other half of his fold, when he could gather them all, in if he saw fit, without enacting any horror. What an altogether lovely and merciful God, eh? I hope this woman and others of her ilk enjoy themselvs in worshiping such a merciful God! In the mean time, pending the coming of the quake, I notice no great movement heavenward on the part of our citizens, who are probably "taking the chances," hoping to escape the calamity when it does come, rushing then into the arms of the Lord. The God that recruits his armies by the aid of earthquakes is a brilliant strategist, I think, though a bloody one. But then the Christian God and Christian religion without blood would be of a milk-and-watery order, as it were; altogether too insipid for Christians. If the earth quakes hereabouts she will quake, and we can't help ourselvs, nor stave it off with any amount of prayer; and it is much more consoling—if there is any consolation about it—to believe that nature is getting in her work, rather than that an imaginary angry God is doing the horrible business.

Religious Campaign Stories.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 16th we noted the indorsement by Mr. Talmage, of Brooklyn, of the Christian campaign story about a man in Lima, Ohio, being struck down by the Almighty because the man flourished a knife toward the sky and dared the Almighty to descend. It seems that the editor of the Sun, of this city, also read Mr. Talmage's sermon, and it seems also that he did not believe this story. At any rate, the editor sent a reporter to interview Mr. Talmage concerning the unusual phenomenon. Mr. Talmage was asked for a circumstantial account of the blasphemer who was miraculously burnt to death, and his response was as follows:

"I appreciate the desire for further details in the matter, and I purposely avoided locating the event, and the reasons that actuated me then impel me now to keep the affair from the public. Such an event is a terrible thing for the family and friends of the man who was punished, and it was out of consideration for them that I omitted to state where the scene was laid. That it is strictly true, however, I hav conclusiv evidence. I forget just how it was brought to my attention. I heard it reported by somebody or got my first information from a private letter, I cannot say which, but I am inclined to think it was the letter. But no matter. I asked a trusted friend of mine to investigate for me, and he did so. Some correspondence ensued, which he turned over to me, and from it I am assured that the affair did actually and exactly take place as I described it. I hav the correspondence still, but I think I had better keep it to myself."

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 18th we reprinted from the Globe-Republic, of Springfield, Ohio, the weird tale of some imaginative reporter, from which Mr. Talmage obtained the material for his assertion. It was said to hav occurred in Mercer county, near Lima, Allen county, Ohio, and the victim of the Almighty's wrath was said to be Sylvester Redyan. The whole story is a fabrication from beginning to end, and is known to be such to every intelligent person in the country. But here is Talmage, the most prominent Presbyterian minister in the country, not only telling it from the pulpit, but vouching for its truth on the authority of a "trusted friend" who investigated it, from which investigation Talmage knows it "did actually and exactly take place as" he "described it!"

Had not Talmage vouched for its truth, the story would hav been worth no further thought. And were it not that he is the biggest preacher in the Presbyterian church, his indorsement would not be worth considering. But as he positivly asserts that the story is true, we may perhaps be pardoned for wasting a little space upon the subject. Our readers who recollect the details of the affair will remember that the substance of the story is as follows: 1. Redyan lived in Mercer county. 2. His place was one and one-half miles east of Lima, which is in Allen county. 3. That the neighborhood is thinly settled. 4. That Redyan was sitting at the mouth of a cave when stricken. These are the important details that locate the affair, and are told with much circumstantiality in the account from which Talmage derived his information—for that he ever received a letter about the miracle we do not for an instant credit.

But these details are not a little awry. We are in receipt of two letters bearing upon this matter. One is from Watson Heston, and flatly contradicts the Globe-Republic's geographer. He was, he says, born in Allen county, Ohio, and Lima is his old home. "I know," he writes, "almost every foot of ground for thirty miles around. I hav hunted, fished, robbed birds' nests, coon-hunted, and gone sparking all over that country." From Mr. Heston's letter we further derive the following facts: 1. Mercer county does not touch Allen county, and Redyan could not liv in the former county and be within a mile and a half of Lima. 2. One and one-half miles east of Lima (where Redyan is said to hav lived) is located the fair ground and a Mr. Roberst's farm. 3. That, so far from the neighborhood being thinly settled, it is just the contrary. Lima, Ohio, is a city of some twenty thousand inhabitants, and it is slightly improbable that a wilderness should extend to its gates. 4. There is no cave anywhere in the county that Mr. Redyan could hav sat in. Mr. Heston thinks that when Christians get up a miracle of this sort they ought at least to hav the local coloring correct.

The other letter in our possession is from the postmaster of Lima, addressed to J. S. Lichty, of Wilsey, Kansas. Mr. Lichty saw the story going around, and, being of an inquisitiv nature, went to headquarters for his information. The postmaster of Lima wrote him as follows:

"The story is false from beginning to end. No such man ever lived in this part of the country."

That seems to settle the matter, so far as to the alleged miracle, but what shall we say of Talmage for his brazen effrontery, and unscrupulous falsehood to the Sun reporter? Think of the moral rottenness of a minister who can say that "I am assured that the affair did actually and exactly take place" when the affair never took place at all! If he has any correspondence upon which he based his belief, he will do well to produce it, else an incredulous world will be inclined to think the letters are all in his own mind.

This absurd tale is also being used by the Christians of England. Saladin, via the London Secular Review, sends the following request:

"By this post we send letters to E. M. Macdonald, Colonel Ingersoll, Helen Gardener, and J. E. Remsburg respectivly, to take a crowbar and see if they can detach and send us, packed in ice, a small portion, say a thumb or a great toe, of the igneous Mr. Redyan. The winter is coming on, our office is a cold one, and the profits from the Secular Review are not sufficient to purchase coals; so into our grate we should like to stick Mr. Redyan's great toe, and, by its heat, boil our editorial kettle and cook our vesper tea. If we could only get an arm of Mr. Redyan, it would save us coals for the steam-engin which propels the printing machine on which we print off this journal for the glory of God and his Christ. In this appeal our principal rcliance is upon the kind heart of Miss Helen Gardener. If she could send us only one fiery leg of Mr. Redyan, she might depend upon her next book being favorably reviewed by us."

So far as we are concerned, the request must be referred to the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, Presbyterian preacher of Brooklyn, N. Y. As Mr. Talmage is the only person in the United States who knows that the affair did actually and exactly take place, he is the only one who can find one of the late Mr. Redyan's fiery femora over which the vesper tea of Saladin may be boiled. When the latter receives it, he may cable a receipt to Mr. Talmage at our expense.

POSTSCRIPTUM.

TO THE REV. T. DEWITT TALMAGE, BROOKLYN, N. Y.,

Dear Sir: As the most prominent Presbyterian in the country, you hav stood sponsor for the most brazen falsehood of the times. The story of a man being cut down by God which you repeated in your pulpit is a lie, and we challenge you to prove it otherwise. If you can do this—if you can prove that God killed a man for flourishing a knife at the sky; if you can prove that smoke poured from the blasphemer's mouth and nostrils; if you can prove that he lay dying for days, while nobody could go near him; if you can prove that all this "did actually and exactly take place," THE TRUTH SEEKER will make you a present of one thousand dollars.

This offer is made you for the purpose of permanently correcting the habit Christians hav of lying about alleged blasphemers. If God struck this man dead for blasphemy, he did it as a warning to others, and it is your solemn duty, as a faithful servant of God, to make the knowledge of that warning known to the world beyond all controversy. And if you can prove it, think of the power over the ignorant it will giv the ministers of God! It will be worth more to Christianity than all the efforts of all the preachers for a thousand years. If you don't prove it, what will the people say of the effrontery of the minister who vouched for its truth? You must accept this challenge or you must acknowledge, once for all, that this story, as well as all similar alleged visitations of divine wrath upon blasphemers, is but the mendacious invention of stupid piety.

Very truly yours, THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Freethought and Freemasonry.

A case of great interest to Freethinking Masons has just been decided at Helena, Montana, and one of the most outspoken Infidels in the territory is still retained in the Montana Grand Lodge as a member in good and regular standing.

In 1885 O. B. Whitford, of Butte, wrote and published two small pamphlets entitled respectivly, "Bible Fabrications Refuted," and "Christianity a Reward for Crime." For writing and publishing these Mr. Whitford was "indicted" by the Lodge. The indictment was for issuing "profane, blasphemous, and Infidel pamphlets," which the complaining committee alleged constituted an offense against Masonry. The indictment was filed October 8, 1885.

In justification of himself Mr. Whitford published another pamphlet, in which he argued that Masonry did not require one to be a Christian, or to believe the Bible, nor does it forbid him to expose the errors and absurdities of the Christian religion. Mr. Whitford was arraigned at Helena last month, one hundred and three members of the Lodge being present. Mr. Whitford argued his own case, making the Christian members very uneasy, but they attempted no reply. The vote stood fifty-three in favor of considering the writing and publishing the pamphlets no offense to forty-two against that view. Eight members absented themselvs, not being willing to go on record in the case.

This is a triumph for Freethought within the Masonic ranks, and indicates that Freethinkers are in the majority in Montana.

Mr. Reynolds and the New York "Sun."

The New York Sun of November 1st contained the following editorial article:

"We are surprised to see that people of Morris county, in New Jersey, hav taken the pains to procure the indictment of a strolling lecturer, named Reynolds, for denouncing the Bible. There may be an old blaspbemy law of the state which makes such a proceeding possible, but what is the usc of giving the fellow notoriety at the expense of the inhabitants of the county?

"Of course, nothing could hav gratified Reynolds more than his arrest, with the prospect of a long trial, in which he could figure as a martyr to free speech, and so get an ndvertisment that would make of him a curiosity that other fools might pay money to see and hear. With that view, apparently, he has engaged Bob Ingersoll for his defense, and next January, when his trial is to come off, he will be able to play the part of an important public character.

"In reality he is a creature of no consequence whatever, and is not even singular in his hatred of the Bible and of the Christian religion. There are thousands of such blatherskites about, and the publication of his indictment is likely to set their tongues wagging faster than ever. We may see them hiring halls all over the Union, and more especially in the states with blasphemy laws, in the hope of courting prosecution, after the manner of Reynolds, by denouncing the Bible, as if it had done them actual physical injury. Some men of this sort are to be found even in the smallest community, where their vanity is tickled by the attention they receive, because they run counter to cherished objects of veneration, and in New York there are hordes of them. They flatter themselvs that it is a sign of intellectual superiority to oppose commonly received opinions, and to treat the beliefs of other people with contempt, and they are pretty sure to find fools enough to gratify their delusion, either by listening to them with open mouths or by taking the trouble to dispute with them, as if they were worthy of serious consideration.

"Orators like Reynolds can do the Bible no harm, so far as the cause of religion is concerned. Accordingly, when Bob Ingersoll and his disciple go out of their way to speak disrespectfully of the Bible and get angry against it, there is no occasion for good people to be disturbed. Let them alone; suffer them to talk as they please, for it is not such as they who are the enemies of whom the household of faith has reason to be afraid."

Evidently the writer of this is not acquainted with the temper of some of the Christians of Morris county, New Jersey. If he were he would know that their blasphemy law is one of the most precious of their heirlooms from ancient times. All the notoriety they would giv Mr. Reynolds, if they had their way, would be a star chamber trial and the quietest possible journey to Trenton; and the gratification of Mr. Reynolds over his arrest consists so far in the fact that he is still out of prison. For his liberty he is very thankful, but for that he is indebted to Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, and not to a feeling of mercy implanted in the hearts of the Morristown Christians by anything the Sun has said or is likely to say.

Heretofore the Sun has been a stickler for "the rights of the poorest, humblest individual in the land as well as those of the richest and most powerful." Much space in its columns has been well used in reverting to the doctrins of Jefferson, and maintaining their sufficiency for a governmental basis. More than once has the Sun upheld the "sacred right" of free speech in politics, and this abuse of Mr. Reynolds seems to be a sudden as well as great departure from the policy heretofore supreme in its editorial rooms. The departure is as dishonest as it is great. There are, it is true, thousands of outspoken Infidels in the country, but they are not quite so loud-mouthed "blatherskites" as this writer for the Sun; and many halls are hired for lectures, but the purpose of the lecturers is, not to get arrested for blasphemy, but to enlighten the people upon the wickedness of just such religion as inspires the author of this diatribe against Mr. Reynolds. We are not going to advertise the "consequence" of Mr. Reynolds. He is a gentleman widely known in respectable circles, and if the editor of the Sun does not enjoy his acquaintance, the loss is not Mr. Reynolds's. What difference does it make, however, whether the injured and oppressed in this case be a small or a great man? The infernal principle of religious persecution is at the bottom of the matter, and if the victim had been so illustrious a man as Colonel Ingersoll himself, the outrage could not be deepened. The Sun has shouted loud for the "sacred rights" of free speech—we now know with how much sincerity—but when a practical test is made, it is found on the side of oppression, and governed by the pitiful policy of expediency! How different from the conduct of the man it slurs as "Bob" Ingersoll, who defends a man he has never seen but once or twice, because he believes in doing what little he can in defense of the liberty of speech, and because he thinks it the duty of all Freethinkers to do what they can to teach the world better than to decide metaphysical questions by brute force! The editor of the Sun is not a Christian—unlesss recently converted—but who now will ever attribute such sentiments to him?

What a miserable spectacle it is—a great organ of democracy and freedom advising against a blasphemy prosecution because the victim is "a creature of no consequence!" Would the prosecution be right if Mr. Reynolds were a creature of such great consequence as the editor of the Sun? By the logic of our Jeffersonian organ, it would not only be right but commendable. Does the editor of the Sun believe in blasphemy laws for creatures of great consequence, but none for creatures of no consequence? Why this discrimination in favor of the unknown and lowly? In this country there should be no classes, says the Sun; and it goes further and says there are no classes. Yet here we find it making by implication two distinct classes, and a distinction with the difference that one class is to be imprisoned for blasphemy and the other class to go free because of the personal insignificance of its members. When the Sun shines for all (at two cents per shine) it will pay to be a creature of no consequence.

The spirit of this editorial writer is the meanest that ever moved a pen. Compared with him, the fanatics of Boonton are honorable men, and John Calvin was a moral hero. The Boonton Christians went about their work in as manly a way as their pusillanimous natures permitted, and Calvin never snuffled over his victims. This fellow has not a word in condemnation of the injustice of religious persecutions, and if expediency allowed he would probably cheer on the prosecution, and enjoy the agony of the victim. As it is, the prosecution is inexpedient, and should be discontinued, because the victim is of no consequence whatever!

If the Morristown courts only would agree with this fellow, Mr. Reynolds might rejoice over his insignificance.

Irreligious London.

On Sunday, November 2d, a census of attendance of the churches of London was taken. It showed that 400,000 persons attended the services in the morning and 410,000 at night. How many of this number were the same in the evening as in the morning is not given. One-half at least may be safely estimated. This would giv London a church-going population of 610,000 out of a population of over four millions, or about one in seven,

If church-going represents soul-saving—as the ministers allege—what a small harvest the Lord will get and what a large harvest the other fellow will glean! Theologians should apply at once to an architect to draw plans for the enlargement of sheol. Perhaps St. John, the divine, might undertake to make the plans if paid the usual percentage on the cost of the job.

What a useless lot the clergy are! Fifteen hundred years of activ service, with the power of the state to help, and only one in seven of the people can be induced to listen to them.

The Society of Humanity.

There has been in existence in this city for several years a Positivistic and Liberal Society, known as the Society of Humanity. Several years ago the society held regular meetings, but of late years the organization has fallen into innocuous desuetude. About three years ago Mr. Harbel, a German gentleman of humanitarian views, presented the society with a sum of money which, with the interest, now amounts to over ten thousand dollars.

Last Spring, through the efforts of a few of the members, measures were taken to revive the society, and make it activly useful in humanitarian work. With this object the society purchased the building, No. 28 Lafayette Place, making a first payment of ten thousand dollars, the balance of the cost remaining on mortgage. The building is 28 feet wide, 60 feet deep, and four stories in hight.

At the last regular meeting of the society it was voted to convert the parlor floor of this large building into a Free Public Reading Room and Library, and also to hold regular Sunday evening lectures there. A committee was appointed to do the work, consisting of E. M. Macdonald, chairman; E. B. Foote, Jr., Charles Eckhard, James Morris, and Edward King. The committee has been activly at work; shelves are already in position, and the furniture will be moved in as soon as the alterations are completed. The cost of this is about $250. The chairman of the committee has made an appeal to the Freethinkers of the city, which, he is glad to say, is being generously responded to, and the prospect for raising the amount is good. The following donations are thankfully recorded:

Charles Eckhard.....	$20.00	W. M. McLaury, M.D.	5.00
J. C. M.....	20.00	M. Blehas.....	2.00
R. B. M.....	5.00	Wm. Broadbelt.....	2.00
N. F. Howe.....	10.00	J. D. Woolsey.....	5.00
H. Cohn.....	3.00	H. Corry Fowler.....	1.00

The committee has invited Thaddeus B. Wakeman to deliver a series of four lectures before the society, beginning Sunday evening, November 21st. Afterward the engagement will be renewed, or other speakers secured, and it is proposed to make the Sunday evening lectures a permanent feature of the society's work. The Library will be open to every well-behaved person who chooses to avail himself or herself of the privilege, and Liberals from out of town will be most cordially welcome. The intention is to make No. 28 Lafayette Place a headquarters and a home for Liberalism. The work of the society is constructiv, scientific, and social, and is designed to replace the social attraction of the church and the Sunday-school, without any of their nonsense. The society's principles are entirely humanitarian, and all its efforts will be for the welfare of its members and the outside world so far as it can reach it.

Briefly, that is the general program; the details the people who attend the first course of lectures will learn from the chosen speaker. Such work as the society proposes to undertake is a work that has long been needed to be laid hold of by some society in this city.

ONE of the writers in the "Letters from Friends" in this issue seems to think that the views of Mr. Joshee, the Hindoo writer of "Socialism in India," are also the views of the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It would be needless to say that the editor disagrees with almost every idea advocated in that article had it not been made apparent recently that there are a great many people who need a diagram of an idea to enable them to understand it. We printed "Socialism in India" to show the people here what a Hindoo thinks is superior to our civilization. The article represents Mr. Joshee only, and is not the expression of a Freethinker.

A MISSIONARY writing to a religious paper complains that in one district visited a number of young men who had been baptized one Sunday morning were found playing base-ball in the afternoon. They were probably exercising to prevent catching cold.

AT the recent Episcopal church congress in Chicago, Phillips Brooks was one of the strongest opposers of the proposed change of name of the church. His speech against the measure was so intemperate as to produce anger in the bosoms of those reverend gentlemen who favored the change. One of these gentlemen, upon reaching the open air, after hearing Mr. Brooks's address, is reported to hav exclaimed: "A strong man. Yes; and a good man, and an eloquent man; but, my! there are better churchmen than he in hell."

WE find the following among the "Catholic Notes" of a Catholic exchange:

"The Holy Name Society, whose object is the suppression of blasphemy, is making swift progress in Newark. Bishop Wigger warmly commends the society to the faithful."

It seems to us that the Protestants are just now making "swifter progress" toward imprisoning blasphemers in New Jersey than the "Holy Name" society. The Protestants hav one man under indictment and awaiting trial, but we hav not heard of the Catholics arresting anyone. However, there is an Infidel Union in Newark, which meets every Sunday afternoon on Halsey street, close to Broad street, that the "Holy Name" society can experiment upon. By great diligence the society may rival the unorganized Christian cohorts of Boonton.

SAM SMALL, the revivalist, is having trouble with a jeweler of Cincinnati. Mr. Small, it appears, while in that place purchased a diamond locket for his wife, a diamond cluster ring, two small watches, a lot of silverware, another gold watch and a chain, and another lot of silverware. On these purchases he owed a balance of some $330, for which the jeweler has sued him. Mr. Small's first excuse for not meeting the note he had given for $150, and the balance of the account, was that "Brother Jones," his revivalist partner, had not settled with the managers of the camp-meeting near Lancaster, Ohio, and therefore he, Small, was short of funds, but would be flush in a few days. The next excuse was a further "stand-off" of the bill. The third excuse was that in trying to collect the debt Mr. Steinau, the jeweler, was blackmailing him. The matter goes into court, with a very black look for Mr. Small.

FROM Chicago the industrious reporters send back the opinion of Colonel Ingersoll as to the result of the election in New York. Mr. Ingersoll said: "I was for Henry George, and before leaving New York I paired, in order to save my vote. I hoped that George would be elected. He wants to do something. He stands for something. He represents a cause. He is perfectly sincere, and, in my judgment, he would hav made an excellent mayor. If the Republicans had acted wisely they would hav voted for George. They would hav beaten the Democracy. That is the first duty of Republicans. The means are only of secondary importance. If the Republicans had voted for George, the next president would be a Republican. It would hav demoralized the Democrats; but now the Labor party has no better feeling toward the Republicans than Democrats. A new party has been born. The sons of toil hav appealed to the ballot. It is the most potent of all weapons. Strikes and boycotts are of the past. Labor stands with a ballot in its hands, and with that weapon it will succeed. My sympathies are with the workers, and what little I can do I shall gladly do for them. The old parties must get some new ideas or they will soon be regarded as antiquities, fit only for political museums. The office-seekers must make terms with the workingmen or go to work themselvs." While Mr. Ingersoll was in Chicago, Captain Black, one of the counsel for the condemned Anarchists, made strenuous endeavors to induce him to argue the appeal before the Supreme Court, with what success the papers do not report.

ARCHBISHOP PURCELL, Catholic, of Cincinnati, O., took charge of some $4,000,000 belonging to the dupes of his diocese. This sum he was supposed to hold in trust, instead of which he applied it to the building of churches and parochial schools. When his embezzlement became known he went into bankruptcy, and one Mannix was chosen as the assignee of such property as could be saved from the wreck. This amounted to several hundred thousand dollars. Mannix's bondsmen were John Holland, Charles Stewart, Michael Walsh, and George Hoadly, the Freethinking governor of Ohio. It now appears that Mannix is a defaulter to the extent of $250,000, and Judge Hoadly is the first among the bondsmen to tender his share of the loss from Mannix's rascality, amounting to $62,500. The trustees of the Purcell estate accept the sacrifice, and a Freethinker pays the penalty of trusting in Christian morality. The affair is made all the more execrable by the fact that the Catholic church owns millions upon millions of untaxed property, and could indemnify Judge Hoadly without feeling it. But will the church do that act of justice? There is no reason for believing that it will. The church of Rome never disgorges its ill-gotten gains. To save this six thousand dollars it will doubtless be satisfied to let the case stand on record as illustrating the difference between Christian morality and the ethics of Freethought. No illustration of this difference was needed, but if it shall open the eyes of a few dupes of Rome, Judge Hoadly's sacrifice may do some good. But if Hoadly had been the Catholic and Purcell the Freethinker, how it would hav made Rome howl!

NEILLSVILLE, WIS., Oct. 26, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Watts was here a week ago, and delivered three lectures to good-sized audiences. Mr. Watts is one of the best speakers in the Liberal field, and makes a very good impression, presenting his views forcibly. His manner of speaking does much to impress his hearers with the fact that he is in earnest, and the close, logical reason appeals to the judgment of his audience. We should like the Liberals of the Northwest to interest themselvs, and secure the services of Charles Watts during the coming winter.

NORSE, TEX., Oct. 28, 286.

MR. EDITOR: We had the pleasure of two lectures here by the inimitable W. S. Bell, so we can now boast of having heard the ringing of the "Liberty Bell" at Norse. On Thursday night, October 21st, he gave his lecture here on "Liberty and Morality," and on Friday night on "Common Sense."

Although it was a busy time with farmers, being in the midst of wheat-sowing, yet we had a full house both evenings. Mr. Bell is a logical orator. His arguments are irresistibly convincing, and his humorous anecdotes are inimitable and to the point. He shows up the absurdities of the orthodox doctrins of superstitious religion in a masterly manner. His lectures must be heard to be appreciated.

CHICAGO, ILL., Oct. 2, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I would judge from the article by C. L. Carter, M.D., that he is, as he says, a Freethinker from far back—but far back where? He says that the Anarchists certainly should be hung. Now, if he believes that the Anarchists should be hung he believes in murder. I would judge that he was from far back in the church of that monster who murdered his own son, Jesus, and commanded his servants to murder innocent men, women, and children. Again, the doctor says: "The Constitution givs us all free scope to think." So it does; but, doctor, don't think too loud. The doctor also says, "If they don't like our laws, let them leave the country." I say no, let them remain here. Our government is bad, our laws are unjust; we hav a great many wrongs to right, and we need all the help we can get.

STELLA CAMPBELL, Atheist.

CORDOVA, ILL., Oct. 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: In the first installment of Mr. C. Watts's essay on "Evolution and Special Creation," published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of a late date, he says: "One thing is clear, which is that living things were made or came into existence, whatever the mode may hav been or the power by which it occurred, out of non-living matter." Is this true? If it is, then life must come into matter by special creation, for evolution can only unfold that which has a potential or latent existence in it. But allotropism in the elements proves the eternal atomic self-motion of all matter. Chemistry further proves that the forces at work in inorganic are the same we see at work in organic matter. This Mr. Watts admits, and yet believes in the existence of dead matter. Is it not self-evident that life in matter is absolutely necessary to develop it into organisms? And when so developed it is simply cosmic life individualized, as the organism is cosmic matter individualized. Yours truly, J. HOKE, M.D.

ANSONIA, CONN., Oct. 24, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER that the letter to Henry George did not receive the consideration due to it. Let me say a few words in regard to this. The land question, as put down by him, would simply be a return to the feudal system of owning the land, the very thing to be avoided, because it is the system on which kings and churches always stood. It was instituted when the Christian religion came into power by the popes. If any of the readers of this don't believe it, let them read King William the Conqueror, of England, and the introduction of feudalism. I should think, if he studies the misery in England and Ireland caused by this very system of ownership of land, it would cure him of his craze. To break this has caused numerous revolutions in Europe and a Declaration of Independence in America. What would hinder the government giving the land to its favorits under his system? It would be good if the government owned railroads, telegraphs, and the like. But land needs a division; there are too many large landholders already. But the clergy support him; they seem to know how to make their business secure. It seems absurd to me how any sane person can ask for such a thing, and others to support it. What in the world would hinder the clergy and such large landholders as would be so easy to create under his system putting up a king and making clubs trumps? The labor question lies in another direction. By the way, Powderly and his $5,000—what will the $1.50 man in the shop say to it? I hav heard some Knights of Labor say it was a shame, and so believe I. I thought it had been a gathering of sages. Can you tell me how it is that any labor reformer, doctor, newspaper man, scientist, clergyman, rich man, can believe the Bible and be honest in his belief? It puzzles me. Did the Freethinkers and readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER ever think of the two extremities the theologians manufacture and bang us between, for instance, heaven and hell? N. POST.

FORT WORTH, TEX., Oct. 29, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: We had the pleasure of a visit here from Prof. W. S. Bell, who gave us a very interesting lecture last night. The Forth Worth Evening Mail says of the lecture:

Prof. W. S. Bell, of Chicago, gave a lecture last night at Daggett's Hall to a good-sized and appreciativ audience. The subject was "Liberty and Morality." The professor argued that as long as we were tied to party or sect we could not claim to be free men and women; that we must hav the moral courage to express and stand by our opinions, whether they agree with the popular ideas or not; that we ought to do right for the love of right, and not on account of the expectation of a heaven hereafter; that the promis of a glorious future life was nothing else than a bribe, and that this teaching showed its bad effect all through the present social structure. That the lecture was well received by the audience was shown by the frequent applause which interrupted Mr. Bell.

At the conclusion of the professor's discourse an association of Freethinkers was formed under the name of the Forth Worth Secular Union, and the following officers were elected: F. W. Bradley, president: L. P. Root, secretary; and Charles Peters, treasurer. The Fort Worth Secular Union will hold its next meeting at Daggett's Hall Sunday, October 31st, at 1 P.M.

As we are in the midst of an exciting political campaign we did not expect to see many turn out to hear Mr. Bell, and it was therefore an agreeable surprise to the lecturer and the friends who had invited him to Fort Worth to see such a large audience present. Dr. Broiles, the mayor of the city, introduced Mr. Bell, who kept the audience's earnest attention for over two hours.

I believe that we will soon hav a strong Liberal organization here now that the ball has been set a-rolling. Twelve persons signed their names as members last night, and as many more promised to join us at our next meeting.

CHAS. PETERS.

HASTINGS, MICH., Oct. 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The Freethinkers of this place hav just had the pleasure of listening to three lectures by Mr. Charles Watts. The subjects were as follows: Saturday evening, "Secularism, Destructiv and Constructiv;" Sunday afternoon, "Agnosticism and Theism; the Secularist's Reply to the Question, Is There a God?" and Sunday evening, "The Glory of Unbelief." Although we had but a few day's to advertise the lectures, Union Hall, which has a seating capacity of six hundred, was well filled on each occasion. On Sunday evening the hall was literally packed, although the churches were in full blast. It is a modest boast to say that Mr. Watts had four times the number of listeners of all the preachers combined. How long will it be before politicians and time-servers are taught to feel that Freethought is popular? Perhaps not till Freethinkers are better organized, and learn their numbers and power.

At the close of the lecture on Sunday afternoon, Mr. Watts, as is his usual custom, gave an invitation for discussion. A young Baptist preacher in the audience, who was here undergoing the ordeal of a trial, preparatory for "a call of God" to pilot citizens of Hastings safely across the Stygian waters, and consequently feeling excessivly enthusiastic, with considerable flourish and display of bombast, indiscreetly stepped to the front, to be utterly demolished. He failed to take issue with the speaker on a single statement or argument, but proceeded to exhort the audience to "stand up for Jesus," telling them that great intellects had believed in God, including poets, philosophers, and statesmen, naming Shakspere, Longfellow, Daniel Webster, and all the presidents of the United States; that there was a desire in his breast to enjoy heaven, which he quoted the Bible to prove was to be the reward of the believer. After he had finished, Mr. Watts, in a kindly and gentle manner, and in a few words, pointed out where the young man had failed in his argument; reminded him that the number of believers could never prove the truth of any system of religion; that if this were true, the verdict would hav to be given against Christianity, as but a small proportion of the people of the world were Christians; that to desire a thing was no proof that we should ever enjoy it, otherwise all men would be rich, as there is a universal desire for riches; and that heaven, as he had pictured it, might be a very beautiful and pleasant place, but that he had given but one side of the picture; that if the Christian religion be true, there is a hell prepared for the devil and his angels, to which the great mass of humanity are hastening. This little episode occurred to the great delight of the audience, and the ministerial gentleman took consolation in the expression that there might be some one in the large audience who agreed with him. When I observed the difference in the young man's manner before and after the discussion, I recalled the story told of the consolation given by an eminent divine to a young preacher under similar circumstances, to wit, "If you had ascended as you descended, you might hav descended as you ascended."

Mr. Watts is truly a great speaker, and the minister who attempts to measure swords with him must not only be possessed of the Holy Ghost, but be armed with knowledge and logic. The lectures were a grand success, and Freethinkers were delighted with Mr. Watts's manner and ability. He should be constantly employed. CHAS. H. BAUER.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Oct. 28, 286.

MR. EDITOR: I wish it were possible to keep that brother of yours "idling" the year round, if he would only write as interesting a letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER every week as the one in the Sept. 11th issue. I had anticipated it some time before it came, but was highly pleased when it made its appearance, for I find that he had not lived entirely in vain. Speaking of the friends he met, "Not only those who still walk the earth, but those who hav sunk back to that dreamless sleep from which they first awakened on this life," it would appear from that there cannot be much superstition hanging about him; and it seems that there cannot be in anyone who will "investigate," taking science as a basis, and this world as a field to work in; for science has failed, so far, to discover any ghosts, spirits, or souls or their hiding-place. Some people think they hav "investigated" when they hav groped around in darkness outside of this world, using faith and credulity as a basis until they hav worked themselvs up to a feverish state of mind by their imagination, claiming to see and know that which it is impossible for others to see and know that use their reason and are not blinded by prejudice and fear.

Not until humanity has been educated up to the idea that mankind hav sprung or evolved from the same source as other animals, and not "made for a higher purpose," will people stop believing in a world peopled with the spirits or souls of defunct humans, with their brothers, the animals, barred out, together with those that do not believe.

Materialists are often asked how matter came into existence. It is not necessary for the Materialist to go on and theorize about matter, as we are all aware that matter or material does exist; so that all the theory that may be put forth will not prove how matter first came into existence, or what it was or is destined to accomplish through evolution or otherwise; it is those that set up a theory that there is a separate existence outside or independent of matter that ought to be obliged to explain and prove their theory, and to do it so far as to satisfy themselves before they should expect to make converts of Materialists.

A great deal has been said pro and con about the Anarchists of Chicago. The cause of the workingmen of America has been set back several years by their pretended affiliation with the laboring cause. I sincerely hope that the friends of the Secular Union will not espouse their cause and thereby retard the forward movement of Secularization. I believe the Anarchists hav had as fair a trial as it is possible for any one to get in this or any other land that is governed by Christianized laws; therefore, it should be the duty of the Secular Union, instead of attempting to take up too many outside issues, to fight religion in all its forms, whether it be found in the administration of laws framed and passed by Christian legislators, and interpreted by Christian judges before Christian juries, or whether it flows from the pulpit, rostrum, or public schools; or whether it crops out in the toadying form of a president kissing the Bible while taking the oath of office; or in the fawning and cringing manner of a master workingman who says his first "duty is to the church;" or in the debasing form of belief in some of the isms of the day; all of these must go, and that can only be done by the Secularization of society, and when that is fully accomplished there will be no occasion for Anarchism, Socialism, or any of the kindred isms of the world.

L. L. NORTHUP.

FORESTPORT, N. Y., Oct. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a subscriber for your paper only a short time, and perhaps I am too hasty in giving expression to my views. Let the deep interest I take in the subject of truth seeking plead for my precipitancy. I find a genuin pleasure in reading the articles of Watts, Peck, Reynolds, and many others, your own being generally among the very best—pointed, forcible, and luminous. But the pleasure is sometimes dashed with pain when I see attempts made to justify or palliate the doings of Anarchists. You plead for absolute freedom of thought and of speech, claiming that no one should be punished for unlimited indulgence in either or both. Is not that going a little too far? To my mind freedom of speech is not permissible further than freedom of action should be. If it is wrong to commit theft, arson, and murder, it must be equally wrong to advise others to do so. And, as I understand it, that is precisely what those Chicago Anarchists are to be punished for—inciting others to do what they were too cunning or too cowardly to do themselvs.

I see no wrong in that. I can respect a man having the courage of his convictions—being ready at all times to do what he thinks ought to be done—but I hav no sympathy for a sneak.

To say a man may be punished for throwing a dynamite bomb into a dense crowd in the streets of a city, while the persons who plotted, incited, and urged on the deadly work should be allowed to go free, is, in my opinion, not truth, but sophistry, similar in character to the "holy Christian doctrin" that rejoices in sending swindlers and ravishers to heaven, while condemning the victims to the everlasting pains of hell for trusting to their protestations of friendliness and love.

I had no intention to say a word upon this subject of Anarchism, nor take any part in the present discussion, until I saw in your last issue the first part of an essay under the heading of "Socialism in India." When I read that I felt that each of your readers was called upon to speak his mind, and let you know what he thought about it. My opinion is that Socialism as foreshadowed in this essay is quite as bad as Anarchism; that each is founded upon misrepresentation and calumny, and that honest, intelligent Freethinkers should hav nothing to do with either, further than to expose their fallacies and warn our friends to keep clear of them. Some men of our party seem to think that, because Socialists and Anarchists are at enmity with the churches, therefore they must become useful friends and allies of ours. It is a great mistake. They are doing us far more harm than good. We are held responsible for their misdeeds, and taunted with being advocates of their brutal theories. Every Anarchist outbreak and Socialistic manifesto that has startled the country during the past year has been a serious set-back to the cause we represent. Everything of that sort that givs a shock to the moral sense of society is a real godsend to the preachers. They snatch at it with avidity, exaggerate, distort, and paint it in colors to suit themselvs, for the purpose of showing their congregations that all who are outside the pale of the church are wofully bad already and constantly growing worse. It helps to draw public attention away from their own swindling operations of selling sermons and sacraments to their infatuated dupes. We could not please them better than by furnishing such texts for their Sunday discourses.

The Irish hav a proverb telling them, "'Tis better to trust the devil you know than the devil you don't know," and there is force enough in it to keep thousands of them nominally attached to their church, trusting, or pretending to trust, their old acquaintance rather than go out to meet any of the new candidates for popular favor. Many of them, however, hav already attained that firmness of character that comes from self-reliance and self-respect, and, consequently, hav set up housekeeping on their own account, believing themselvs competent to manage their own affairs both as regards this world and the next; without aid or interference from priests or saints either dead or alive. Many others would soon follow their example, if they could be assured that there was any real standing-room between the mother of superstition and the muddy pool of Socialism.

We know that there is plenty of room, a fair field, and adequate rewards awaiting the exercise of intelligent industry. And here is where the truth seeker ought to go, keeping ahead of the crowd, and pointing out the direction we ought to follow. Truth can never be put to better use than showing men how to lead decent and comfortable lives.

Truth crushed to earth shall rise again,
To ease a world of woe and pain,
And terminate the ghastly reign
Of hoary superstition.
When honest nature, unconfined,
Shall raise aloft the human mind,
To grasp such thoughts as were designed
To better our condition.

JEREMIAH O'BRIEN.

FORT MADISON, IA., Oct. 26, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: During the few months my husband has belonged to the TRUTH SEEKER family, I hav read your most excellent paper with growing interest.

I am happy to say I never was a Christian, therefore I never hav had to climb out of the "Slough of Superstition" and "Bunyan Mud," so aptly illustrated in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 21st. We enjoy the illustrations very much. I think everyone of them is a sermon in itself. I truly hope they may accomplish as much good work as the many readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER can desire for them.

This is an orthodox town of the most pronounced type. I think there are not more than a dozen here who hav stamina enough to openly declare themselvs Freethinkers. There has never been, to my knowledge, a Liberal lecturer here. The few real Liberals of this town would hail with delight a Liberal lecturer who would stir up the slums of orthodoxy, and open the eyes of the people to the beauties of Liberalism, and show them that the "God-inspired book" they hav swallowed so long is a mass of corruption. Oh! that Mr. Reynolds might "cast a few pearls" before the "swine" of Fort Madison. There are many men here who like to style themselvs Liberals, when they are out of hearing of their Christian friends, but they are afraid to say so openly for fear it would damage their business. Such men are worse than the most ignorant Catholic. Giv me a man who will say what he honestly believes, business or no business.

I hav been an admirer of Colonel Ingersoll for several years, in fact, ever since I first began reading his lectures in 1879. I also read a few copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER about that time. I had the pleasure of hearing both Colonel Ingersoll and Mr. Remsburg in Grand Rapids, Mich., where I lived until about a year ago. I was glad to learn that Mr. Watts had been turning the ministers of that place over again.

Grand Rapids is a splendid city, and there are many noble Liberals there, but there are also many more who hav never beheld the dawn of reason, and many who, perhaps, never will.

MRS. L. L. GUSTIN.

ST. PAUL, MINN., Oct. 19, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Having followed all the discussions in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the justice and injustice of the verdict against the Anarchists, I would like to state my views on the subject, if you should consider them worth the space, not meaning to imply by this article that you are an exponent of their doctrin, for I, as well as every regular reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, know that your pen has been employed as one of their most rigid opponents, which I am sorry to see Mr. Truesdell has overlooked. I also understand that your present defense of them is not of their doctrins, but their right of free speech in proclaiming those doctrins to the world, in which I agree with you. Now, the Anarchists hav been charged with inciting people to riots, destruction of property, and murder. I am also aware they were indicted on the charge of murder, and proven guilty of Anarchy. But providing they did not throw the bomb, were they not the mouthpieces of the men, and hav they not repeatedly made incendiary speeches and also printed them? Hav they not openly countenanced the taking of life to further their purposes? Now, my idea of free speech is this: that I hav a right to express my belief pro and con, providing that I use no threats that will hav a tendency to restrict another in the free expression of his views. When I do this, I do not consider it free speech. This very thing is the one thing that we hav always contended against. Then, why should we countenance it in others? Is not the person that incites to the commission of crime equally as guilty as the one that commits it? In my opinion he is. Now, had they taught their tenets unaccompanied by threats, I would hav defended them, but so far I hav seen no reason why I should. For of what use is law if it does not protect the lives and property of the people? and also of what use is the law to me if, when a person threatens my life, I must wait quietly until the deed is done? Better by far to hav Anarchy, and then I can defend myself on the moment. These Anarchists, according to their speeches, were simply following in the rut that had been made by the priests and ministers of the Christian religion, and that is the rut of terror, for the sake of plunder. Now, why should we palliate anything of the sort? And if in the citation of any of these charges I hav erred, I stand ready to be righted, for I would not knowingly do any person the injustice of presenting a false charge.

R. S. C.

EAST PORTLAND, OR., Oct. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find an order for $1.75—$1 for the defense of Mr. Reynolds. I feel very deeply for him, because, if I had been in New Jersey, I might hav been in the same fix. For the 75 cents send me "The Truth Seeker Collection."

Mr. Editor, the usual belief among the people is that the editor of a paper ought to know everything. I will take it for granted that that is so, and shall ask you a question in natural history. The eleventh chapter, twentieth verse, of Leviticus says, "All fowls that creep, going on all four, shall be an abomination unto you." If you will describe those fowls, or giv a picture of them, you will greatly oblige me, as, between six-winged angels and four-footed fowls, I am entirely lost, and a description from you will help me out greatly.

C. L. SILVERMAN.

SPRINGVILLE, UTAH, Oct. 27, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to inform you that we hav $2 now for our friend C. B. Reynolds, and having been with friend H. S. Brooks lately, we concluded to see if a little more could be raised, feeling that it was our duty to do something according to our ability to sustain those battling in the front line for our good in the cause of Universal Mental Liberty.

Your advocacy of free speech, the outlet of free thought, we approve, and also your stand to defend each and every one in this right.

We may be slow here in our work for the good of humanity, but are not in a sleepy mood, as we watch, and expect to continue faithful so long as we read the grand and good old TRUTH SEEKER—for which I must try and get at least one new subscriber soon; and if I don't succeed "I'll try, try again."

LUKE WM. GALLUP.

SAN JOSE, CAL., Oct. 15, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose an $8 post-office order. Please apply $3 on my subscription. For the $5 please send me a few cheap pamphlets selected from the list which I inclose.

I cannot say that I like THE TRUTH SEEKER as well as I did. You hav got too much mixed up with the Anarchists, dynamiters, and bomb-throwers. A long time ago I wrote to Somerby to drop my name from the subscription list, but as the paper keeps coming I shall pay for it, of course. We are badly smirched. Church and priest hav a fine handle to work with. They can't see the nice points in your arguments between an Anarchist and a defender of liberty and equal rights. Neither do some of the Secular journalists. But we are all thrown in a pile together and called Socialists, Freethinkers, Anarchists, Atheists, bomb-throwers, and blasphemers—one class as bad as the other. Think you that the weak, timid, and credulous will not believe all this? Has not the noble cause of Freethought been retarded at least a quarter of a century? We are bespattered. How long will it take us to scrape the mud off? I proved this and predicted it when T. C. Leland took in that rank Socialist, Osborn Ward, as co-editor, and when you TRUTH SEEKER folks began to pet and sympathize with Socialists. I know your arguments are sound in defense of liberty, but many can't see the points you make and cry out "Anarchist" because you stand up for them. My views are well expressed in the clipping I inclose. I hav no sympathy with Anarchists or bomb-throwers, nor with those who invite others to throw them. Freethinkers hav work enough of their own. There is no occasion to ride all the hobbies.

I take the Investigator. I like Seaver's course the best. His type is the best for old eyes. His articles are short and pithy. He has a greater variety. There, now! Hav not I scolded about enough? Our finding fault will do no harm if you take it in good humor. I am going to stick by you a while longer. I can stand the pictures if the rest can. If I can't read the fine print, I can hand the papers to some who can. I can stand what Spiritualism you hav, but I would like it better if some of you scientists would explain the phenomena on scientific principles if you can. I hav tried myself to test some of the mediums to get at something reliable, but hav had no luck as yet. May THE TRUTH SEEKER keep off the breakers and be prepared to tackle any black piratical craft that heaves in sight.

SAMOS PARSONS.

WATERVILLE, MINN., Nov. 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: It is all politics up this way just now, and religious matters are laid on the shelf, so to speak, until after election. The Republicans hav nominated for governor A. R. McGill, a man of ordinary abilities, but of good reputation. The Democratic candidate is Dr. A. A. Ames, an avowed champion of the "wide open" policy, and consequently very popular with the saloon element and that ubiquitous class known as "the boys. And last and least comes the Prohibitionists, who are running a full ticket with an Irish Catholic at the head for governor, and they do say that there are lots of sore heads, disappointed office-seekers, victims of unrequited love, and ministers of the gospel who are going to vote for him, and there will no doubt be quite a large vote for the man who would like to kiss the pope's big toe. There is a sect of Christians who hav a settlement about five miles from here, who for downright foolishness take the biscuit. They are called the Dunkers or Dunkards, probably from some old saint, long since gone to meet an avenging God. There are many peculiarities about these people, but I will only undertake to tell a few of them, and many of your readers will no doubt be familiar with the species. The men all part their hair in the middle, and when they meet one another they obey the scriptural injunction to "greet the brethren with a kiss," and it is an edifying spectacle to see two old duffers tackle each other and swap tobacco juice. If this applied between the men and the women there is no doubt that the church would soon be the largest in the United States, but it does not, and the boys refuse to come in. About twice a year they gather from near and far and hold a regular pow-wow, at which time there is always present all the gifted ones the tribe possess, and the gospel is dispensed with a liberal hand to all. At these meetings the ceremony of feet-washing is also gone through with, to the great delight of the boys, who always gather in for miles around when they know what is going to take place. There can be no doubt that the idea of washing their feet is a good one, and it might be followed by other churches with great results. After their feet hav been relieved of the accumulated fertilizer, they hold what they call a soup-meeting, to which all are invited, no matter whether they hav a ticket or not. Six or eight eat from one dish, a custom which some people are prejudiced enough to dislike. This takes the place of the communion, as held in other churches. They hav no ministers except those among them who hav the gift of gab, and use the gift without stint. They also hav no churches, meeting in dwelling-houses and in barns in summer, and there is always a crowd of the ungodly around to see the fun. In their peculiar religious views they are as bigoted as a Catholic, and as a rule more ignorant, and their sermons are the worst kind of slush. But they are generally honest farmers, and no doubt think they are doing God a great service by their duties.

L. ALEXANDER.

CHICAGO, ILL., Oct. 24, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I am, doubtless, a stranger to you, but I buy a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER every week, of Mr. Follet, and through it I keep posted as to the progress of Freethought.

I hav been a Christian for the past twenty years, not as a church-member, but outside of the churches. Yet I believed the Bible to be the inspired word of a divine being called God, for which being I now find no place nor occupation. In fact, his occupation is gone.

The members of my family adhere more or less to the belief that our civilization is due to the church element and teachings, and I frequently attend divine (?) service with them. But I am not permitted to criticise the sermon at all on pain of having the displeasure of every one of the family. However, the absurdities which the preachers are guilty of getting off are too much for me sometimes, and I am compelled to break out.

Last Sunday I went to hear a female Universalist. She gave us quite a good scientific, moral lecture, but near its close she related an incident of her pastoral calls. She said: "When I returned from abroad I called on a poor working-woman, a widow, who had two small children. She told me she had passed through a very severe trial of her faith. One of her children was taken sick, which made it very difficult for her to get any work. Then the other child was taken down, and lastly she took sick herself. Then she said: 'I knew that God was not just.' I said to her: 'But, how about the sewerage?' She replied: 'The doctor told us we must leave this house or we would all die.' 'Well,' I said, 'you lay upon God what should be laid upon the sewers.'"

The preacher then went on to tell us that God had so arranged it that we must be cleanly if we wanted to enjoy health. I just wanted to ask her why it was that God's inspired servant, Paul, had not said something about the sanitary conditions of our homes instead of saying, "If any be sick let them call in the elders, and let them lay hands on them, anointing them with oil in the name of the Lord, . . . and if he hav committed sins he shall be forgiven." This implies that sickness is the result of sin against God.

Well, if we must look out for our sanitary surroundings in order to hav health, another of God's alleged occupations is gone. I hav some hope that the course which the churches are now pursuing will result in making more Freethinkers in their ranks. I refer to the Chautauqua circles. They study scientific subjects. It is really amusing to see how the works they read contradict the Bible, and yet they don't seem to "get onto it." The fact is, the average Christian knows very little of the Bible. And if I call their attention to the conflict between science and their faith, they imagin that I am an enemy to morality and society. O ignorance! what a curse thou art, and yet Christians hug thee to their bosoms as a lovely thing.

I said that I had been a Christian outside of the churches. Yes, I held and do still hold that if that old book, the Bible, was dictated by an all-wise being, then it is the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and consequently I honored its precepts and laws where the churches disregarded them. But now that I hav got entirely free from bondage, I see that I followed its teachings only in so far as they were good moral teachings.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has done much to show me the horrid deformity of the character of God, as depicted in that old book. On the whole I hav been for some years quite a Freethinker on some points, and yet very fanatical on others. And I think that Liberals who hav once been believers will almost to a man agree with me that doubt as to the divinity of Christ is the opening wedge to downright Atheism. I am an Atheist, and I can't help it. I once feared that I might become one, and the fear was the most paralyzing thing imaginable, but now I rejoice in being one. I often wonder how I, with such a faculty for getting at rock-bottom facts, could be so long held in the bonds of superstition. It is sickening to hear people attributing our progress in civilization to the efforts of Christianity; but at the same time it is cheering to me to find so many young people beginning to think for themselvs. I pass around my Freethought literature on the train on which I ride every morning and evening, and receive many words of cheer. I suppose I would scarcely dare do so if I lived in New Jersey instead of Illinois. If I had a good "gift of gab," I should certainly be compelled to take to the platform in the interest of Freethought.

JOHN HUDSON.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Rally of the Birds.

The lark * sings sweet her autumn song
When the smoky days are coming,
The bluejay's larum tells of wrong,
And turtle-doves are moaning.

Orioles sailed to southern seas
As early as September,
The northern light of our young glad trees
Had lit their wings with splendor.

The mockingbird went weeks ago,
Though rnling all the summer,
When other birds hid high and low
Bemoaning such a comer.

But plaintiv tones of the Indian hen,†
In cottonwoods or willows,
Was like a lone bell tolling when
A wreck is on the billows.

The saucy catbird's gray young clan,
The bluebird in her glory,
Are answering to the "rat-a-plan"
Learned from a soldier's story.

The brown thrush, heeding leaves that fell,
Has called her kin together,
Leaving a void in the windy dell,
And the brown October weather.

Catalpa-trees are black with frost,
The groundbird hiding under
(In Quaker dress when song is lost)
Awakes to the whirring thunder.

The shrike ‡ hangs high his stolen prey
In thorny groves and bushes,
And says good-bye in his noisy way
To the going jays and thrushes.

I heard the geese fly o'er last night,
When skies were dim and "eerie,"
While cranes had camped by the river's light
As travelers wan and weary.

The wild duck wheeling overhead
Has come from corn and ryelands,
And plovers pierce the evening red
That reaches southern skylands.

In all the storm of wordy war,
A fierce but friendly clamor,
The cherry-trees were breastworks for
The frightened yellow-hammer.

The wren shook out her faded frock,
And chattered in the gloaming,
And blackbirds brought an elfish flock,
And lonely doves were moaning.

I asked the crow in ebon coat,
If aught of armed offender
Had hastened him. Swift came his note:
"Naw, naw, naw!—Nawvember."
Frenchtown, Neb. MARY BAIRD-FINCH.

* The lark invariably sings a parting song before taking her leave for the south.

† The Indian hen, a small shy bird with a wailing song, is the only one of the feathered tribe that dares to sing a note when the mockingbird first makes his appearance in the spring.

‡ The shrike, or butcherbird, that stays with us during the winter, has the curious habit of impaling on thorns and twigs his prey of mice, small birds, grasshoppers, etc, after the manner of a butcher hanging his meat. Hence the name.

Lizzie.

I hav just been reading, in the Children's Corner, Miss Wixon's story of Jo, and thought I would also write a true Indian story for its dear little readers. It is not about a brave, but a little papoose—a little girl about three years of age.

She belongs to the Piute tribe. They are not considered as intelligent as the Cherokees, who are the most intelligent of all the tribes, or the Penobscots, who are also civilized, or the Sioux, or Blackfeet, who are very cruel—or even the Washos or Yumas, and many others; yet they are superior to the Diggers. This little girl's name is Lizzie. The Indians here hav lived among the white people so long that they use our names for their children; and, as the white people dislike calling them by their Indian names, which are so hard to remember and pronounce, when they hire an Indian or squaw to work they giv them a name, and often their own, which they feel proud of, and are called by ever after by both white people and Indians. One time, when I was ill, and lying on the sofa, Sally, Lizzie's grandma, was washing, and Lizzie came in the room where I was, for I had often petted her, and she thought much of me.

Seeing me lying down, she proceeded to cover me, first with a bit of print, the size of a man's two hands, which she put over my feet; next a small cape; then a chair tidy; afterward a little braided sack that we tie on the saddle to bring our mail in from town.

She was at a loss what to take next, as I still lacked a good deal of being covered, but finally found a doll's dress, belonging to my little girl Lomie. Lomie then came in, and, picking up a book, found the first letter of the alphabet, and told her its name.

Several days afterward, she was with us again, and picking up a newspaper, looked at it some time, then came to me with her finger on the letter Lomie found in the book, saying, "A, a."

She has a little baby brother, whom I hav named Willie. He is several months old, and will crow, and laugh, and kick, and put his fat fists in his mouth, like any white baby.

Another time, if Miss Wixon and the children wish, I will tell them more about the Indians of this country. SADIE A. MAGOON.

[We shall be pleased to hear about the Indians of California, or any subject, whenever our good sister has time to tell us. We thank her for contributions.—ED. C. C.]

The Clothes-Pin Garden.

One, two, three, four broken clothes-pins in the midst of the dead flowers and leaves in Benny Blake's garden.

"How came they there?" I asked.

But Benny looked very sober; and, digging the toe of his little boot into the carpet, he said in a low voice, "I put them there, Auntie."

"What for, dear?"

"Cause," said Benny. "But it is a very great secret with mamma and me," he added.

"A nice one, I hope dear?"

"Not—a—very—nice one," replied Benny. "I've had lots and lots nicer."

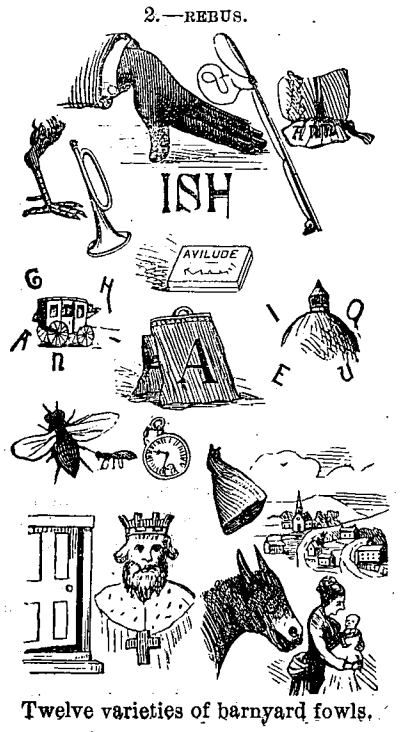
When he said this, his voice was sober, as well as his dear little face. Of course, I did not try to find out the secret. I heard nothing more about the clothes-pins until this summer, when we were at the seashore together.

One day, Benny made a sand-garden, with shells and stones for a wall. In it he put some wild flowers he had gathered that morning. When it was in full bloom he led mamma to it, saying, with a happy smile on his face, "These are ever so much nicer than old clothes-pins, aren't they—the flowers are?"

The tears came into mamma's eyes as she kissed the dear face. Her voice trembled as she answered, "So much nicer, darling."

The next day I was told the secret. Benny had one dreadful fault—sometimes he would tell a lie. So, every time he told an untruth, mamma had him put a broken clothes-pin next to the choicest blossom in his own garden.

All summer he had to see them, and when the winter snows came there were one, two, three, four little white mounds which he could see from the window. Monuments to four lies!



Now, you can understand why he was so happy with the flowers in his sand garden, and why the tears of joy came into mamma's eyes.—M. Kingston in Our Little Ones.

Correspondence.

COLON, MICH., Nov. 1, 286.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Madam: Encouraged by seeing my first letter in print, I will try and write a second, but I am sorry for my first, for I am afraid that I scared Uncle John from the Children's Corner, but I hope not. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER very much, especially the Children's Corner, aud those beautiful pieces from Mr. Putnam's pen. I would like to hear from some of the little Freethought boys and girls. If they write direct to me, I will answer them, for I am a little Freethought boy, and as for my political views, I am solid on the greenback question. I spent my vacation at home this summer, and now I am back to Grandpa Powers's house attending school. We hav a nice school here. We had examination the other day, and I averaged 99 in my studies. I wish, Miss Wixon, you could visit me at my home. We liv in a pleasant place. I would try and make your stay as pleasant as I could. I send my love to you,

FRANCIS B. CORNWALL.

[Francis is evidently one of our bright little Freethinkers, who will some time be heard from on some of the great questions of the day. We would like to see Francis at his home, but hardly expect that pleasure, though we may meet him some time in the future.—ED. C. C.]

FRENCHTOWN, NEB., Oct. 20, 1886.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: What fine stories and essays our young contributors are writing for the Corner! The little girl's descriptiv letter from Colorado and the comparison between Freethought and Christianity are interesting for grown-up folks. The older writers will hav to look well to their laurels. I herewith inclose a poem for the Corner, with good wishes and congratulations.

Yours for truth and humanity,

MRS. M. B. FINCH.

BISHOP CREEK, Oct. 19, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you another letter. How are you getting along now? I would like to see you so much. I am going to school every day. My teacher is a man; but I like him, and he makes us learn fast, and talks with us, and tells us stories besides. Since I wrote you last, my rabbits hav had four little ones. My pair (one is black and one is white) hav made a hole under the granary, and mamma and Auntie Luna think perhaps some day there will be some baby rabbits there. We hav a white poodle dog named Curly Que (we call him Que), two cats, two turtle-doves, two robins, that liv all in peace together and do not hurt each other.

From your true friend,

RUBY LOTTIE ATWOOD.

[Ruby must be a happy little girl with so many little pets. We thank her for her letter, and shall always be pleased to hear from her.—ED. C. C.]

WHAT'S TO BE DONE?

A NIHILISTIC ROMANCE.

By N. G. TCHERNYCHEWSKY. With a portrait of the Author. Translated by BENJ. R. TUCKER.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

Bible Myths, and their Parallels in Other Religions: Being a comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity, considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous illustrations. 1 vol. Royal 8vo. 567 pages. Cloth, $4.00.

The object of this work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then to trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning. It contains quotations from nearly all the sacred books of heathen nations, and from other rare and valuable works which are not accessible to people in general. The chapters are so arranged that it is a perfect cyclopedia of reference. Years of research would be necessary to discover all the information it contains. It is a most searching investigation into the origin of Christianity. Every fact is verified by copious notes and authorities, so that it may be trusted as a thoroughly reliable work. It contains information which will be startling to many.

Bible of Humanity. By JULES MICHELET. Translated from the French by V. CALFA. 8vo. cloth, $3. This is a large epic in prose. The artist historian sings the evolution of mankind. He throws brilliant glimpses of light on the long course of events and works which he unfolds.

Books for Veteran Soldiers.

To S. P. Putnam, Secretary American Secular Union:

BROTHER AND COMRADE: I wish by your hand to present to the Liberals of the United States the claims of the Freethinking veterans in the soldiers' homes to their generosity.

While Christianity, as represented by the steeple churches, brags of its beneficences, though it has stolen its greatest wealth, both of thought and money, from the misnamed Infidel, Secularism, as organized in the body whereof you are scribe, cannot show more striking proof of its sense of duty and devotion than by shedding its light into the library of the Soldiers' Home, which, as yet superabounds with orthodox sermon books, bound magazines vilifying the characters of the nation's founders, and with priestly papers which still try to enslave the minds of people, glaring in the face of veterans who offered all on the altar of freedom.

I do not feel that I am begging when I request you to pass the hat at the Congress to be held in Chickering Hall to pay for a selection of suitable volumes from the Bennett bookstore, and Investigator office, to be donated to the several branches of the National Military Homes, located at Dayton, O., Milwaukee, Wis., Leavenworth, Kan., Togus, Me., Washington, D. C., and Hampton, Va.

I ask particularly for the works of Thomas Paine and of Colonel Ingersoll—the one who drafted the Declaration of Independence, and the other who spoke "A Vision of War."

I make this request of my own motion, but vouch for the thankfulness of many of my associates, who, though past hard labors of body, yet hav busy minds, and may, perhaps, write not without effect.

Yours for liberty and union,

JOHN PRESCOTT GUILD.

"Oh, Them Picters!"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In an article published in the North American Review (May, 1883) on "Emerson and Carlyle," this significant sentence occurs—but we will reproduce the entire paragraph:

"Thomas Carlyle had a wonderful power of sketching in a few words physical and mental portraits of the men he met, somewhat resembling the skill of Thomas Nast in the grotesque caricatures he has contributed to Harper's Weekly. The two Thomases had this in common, that every peculiarity of face, feature, shape of the head, color of the hair, movement of the body, or any other merely physical characteristic, was made significant of mental or moral qualities in the person delineated. Nast contributed, more than anybody else, to the overthrow of the 'Tweed Ring' which ruled, robbed, and might hav ruined New York, and he did it by his marvelous appeals to the eye of the ordinary honest voter, who was perhaps incompetent to form a rational opinion of rascalities through words addressed through his reason and imagination. 'Oh, them picters!' groaned Tweed; 'that was what wrecked us!' Carlyle's portraits by the pen are similar to those of Nast by the pencil, inasmuch as they agree in connecting physiology with psychology, and making a man's inward nature correspond to the exaggerated traits of his bodily organization." "He cannot help letting his mind run riot in picturing individuals."

If Carlyle did wrong in thus allowing his mind to run riot, and Nast was wrong in the broad license of his pencil, then Charles Dickens was a great sinner, and Lord Byron a savage. We may be surprised to find that if the advice to these editors, by some of our well-meaning Freethought friends, was logically carried out Art herself would hav her wings clipped. Poetry would be unlicensed, and would limp like a man with rheumatism. Comedy would be cut up by the roots, and it would be intellectual treason to laugh at the incongruous. If Watson Heston ought to be suppressed for caricaturing Christianity, then a gag ought to be stuffed into the mouth of genius. If the objections of a few Liberals are well-founded, Delaware was right in opposing Colonel Ingersoll for ridiculing our "holy religion." Strange indeed is that, thinking that would squelch Heston and pay Ingersoll a dollar a time; one raising a laugh at the church by his tongue, the other by his pencil! The church has perpetuated her power and influence by demanding solemnity. How few Christian congregations there are, even in these enlightened times, which dare laugh outright in church! God does not like laughter. I remember one occasion when a clergyman rebuked his congregation for laughing; he grew angry in a moment; his face was purple with wrath (holy) as he chided them. "I would hav you know," said he, "that you are in the house of God" That was a clincher. He reminded me of the preacher the little girl told about when she got home, the first preaching she ever heard. She said, "He was awful mad, shook his fist at the people, and not one dared to go up and fight him."

If Christianity could prevent the world laughing at it, it would thrive better. Voltaire, with his wonderful wit, broke its nightmare spell over Europe. Heston is on the right track, if the light of history is of any account. Here in Bozeman, when Mr. Perkins got his TRUTH SEEKER from the post-office, he happened to stand near a building looking at the lastest comical illustration, "There were giants in the earth in those days." A little boy peered over, looked at that omnipresent little ape perched on the giant's head, and burst out into an explosion of side-splitting laughter. There is where Liberalism will win. Picture the absurdities for the youth, and the church cannot hold them. Let us giv the church what it does not want—reason, ridicule, common sense, and cartoons. W. F. JAMIESON.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

THE RISE OF
INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY
From Thales to Copernicus.
By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

Exeter Hall. "One of the most exciting romances of the day." Price, paper, 60 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

Nathaniel Vaughan. Priest and Man. A Radical novel of marked ability. Equal to George Eliot's works. By Frederika Macdonald. 404 pages. $1.25.

The Outcast. A deep, finely written Radical story. From the London edition. By Winwood Reade, author of Martyrdom of Man. 30 cents.

All in a Lifetime. A Romance. By Miss Susan H. Wixon. "The great charm of this novel is its absolute fidelity to nature. Its personages are those one meets with in common life, and are portrayed with a vividness and perspicuity I was scarcely prepared to expect to find, in such a marked degree, even from so gifted a pen as that of Miss Wixon, whose brilliant and lucid style is familiar to most readers in the Freethought ranks." DR. R. P. FELLOWS is a regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove. He has for twenty years treated exclusivly all diseases of the Sexual Organs, in the cures of which he stands preeminent SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in maturer years, causing night emissions by dreams, loss of sexual power, rendering marriage improper and unhappy, etc., are cured permanently by an outside application in sixty days. NO STOMACH MEDICIN USED. It is one of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries, which is entirely unknown to the medical profession. It is not a catch-penny get up, such as a pad, belt, pastille, nor magnetic appliance, but simply a medicin to be applied externally on the parts affected, which cures by absorption. Send five 2-cent stamps for his "Private Counselor," giving full information. Address Dr. R. P. Fellows, Vineland, N. J. and say where you saw this advertisment.

N. B.—Dr. Fellows begs leave to say that he is an Infidel of the most pronounced character. Bro. Liberals, your patronage is solicited.

"SHOPPEL'S MODERN HOUSES" No. 3.

(Just Published, July 1, 1886) CONTAINS:

A colored frontispiece showing the modern style of painting.

A cardboard supplement, ingeniously drawn and colored, to supply all the neccessary pieces for constructing a model house, with plain directions for putting them together.

While the supplement affords both old and young the greatest amusement, it is more than a toy. It is, in fact, a most practical lesson in Architecture; a perfect, scaled model of one of our most popular designs, so exact that it is useful to builders.

55 New Designs for Residences (cost varying from $500 to $15,000).
2 New Designs for Barns.
1 New Design for a Chapel.
Drawings and description of a model Kitchen (by Maria Parloa) and a perfect Cistern.
An Article on Villa Park Associations.

SENT, POSTPAID, ON RECEIPT OF PRICE, $1.

News of the Week.

NOVEMBER 7th was the 250th anniversary of the founding of Harvard College.

THE Prohibition vote in New York last week was 574 out of a possible 240,000.

THERE is another great strike among the butchers of Chicago, 20,000 men having quit work.

THE Vermont House of Representativs has passed a bill granting suffrage to women by a vote of 135 to 82.

THE first snow of the season fell last Saturday night in many places between Minnesota and New York.

THE proposition to hold a convention to revise the constitution of New York was carried at the late election.

THE people of Brule Co., Dakota, hav elected a woman, Miss Alice J. Sanborn, superintendent of schools.

MRS. CLEVELAND was in New York last week. She is at present the object of daily increasing national interest.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND declines the degree of LL.D., which Harvard College contemplated conferring upon him.

THE people who voted for Henry George for mayor of New York will organize themselvs into a permanent party.

THE Rev. C. P. McCarthy said in his last Sunday's sermon that he expected Henry George would be a candidate for president in 1888.

THE torch on the statue of Liberty is not lighted regularly, no provision having been made for that object. The expense of the light is $60 per night.

PHILADELPHIA, it is reported, will soon hav a labor party. The preliminary steps toward its organization hav been taken, and an effort will be made to capture the mayoralty.

THE executiv committee of the Paris exhibition has granted $30,000 with which to construct the proposed tower 984 feet high. It will be the tallest structure in the world.

ONE Donovan, a New York pressman, dropped from the new suspension bridge at Niagara Falls last Sunday, a distance of 200 feet. He was injured by his foolhardy exploit to the extent of a broken rib.

LORD BRABOURNE, writing to the editor of Blackwood's Magazine, accuses Mr. Gladstone of serious misstatements and perversions of Irish history, without the courage to defend or the candor to withdraw them.

M. PASTEUR has informed the Academy of Sciences that he has treated during the past year 2,490 persons who had been bitten by animals, and that out of this number only ten had died. Of the patients 1,726 were French.

MISS ROSE ELIZABETH CLEVELAND is very unhappy over her late experience as an editor. Her publisher is something of a rogue, and refuses to pay for articles which Miss Cleveland caused to be written for his magazine.

THERE is a movement in LaCrosse, Wis., to enforce the entire Sunday law. Even salaried singers in churches hav been notified that they will be arrested if they sing. The mayor is threatened with arrest unless he enforces the law.

DISTRICT ATTORNEY RIDGEWAY, of Brooklyn, was reëlected last week. This is a great disappointment to Anthony Comstock, as Ridgeway has uniformly declined to prosecute cases brought before him by that spy and informer.

A WINNIPEG plasterer named Shules, who contemplated leaving that place for the old country, recently sold his wife and five children to a man named Williams for $70. An agreement was drawn up between the two men, and the property was formally transferred.

MR. JOHN NEWMAN, a respected citizen of Jackson, Tenn., took a pistol one day last week and went out and shot the Rev. G. W. Hinkle in the shoulder, inflicting a painful wound. It is the "old, old story." The Rev. Mr. Hinkle had betrayed the wife of Mr. Newman.

MENTION has been made in these columns of the Rev. Father Sherman, of Brooklyn, whose recent marriage escapade brought out the fact that he had more mistresses than statute law allows, whatever canon law may provide for. Mr. Sherman evidently comes of a bad family. Last Sunday his brother was arrested for burglarly.

Gems of Thought.

IT should be the labor of our lives to inform ourselvs of the uses and abuses of everything that exists, and to learn to make a proper use of all we come in contact with.—D. M. Bennett.

IT is not possible to hav the true pictures and statues of Cyrus, Alexander, Cæsar; no, nor of the kings or great personages of much later years, for the originals cannot last, and the copies cannot but lose of the life and truth. But the images of men's wits and knowledge remain in books, exempted from the ruin of time, and capable of perpetual renovation. Neither are they fitly to be called images, because they generate still, and cast their seeds into the minds of others, provoking and causing infinit actions and opinions in succeeding ages; so that, if the invention of the ship was thought so noble, which carrieth riches and commodities from place to place, and consociateth the most remote regions in participation of their fruits, how much more are letters to be magnified, which, as ships, pass through the vast seas of time and make ages so distant to participate of the wisdom, illuminations, and inventions, the one of the other.—Lord Bacon.

COURAGE, courage! Deliberate valor is God's highest gift, and comes not without trial to any. Times will mend, or, if times never mend, then, in the devil's name, let them stay as they are, or grow worse, and we will mend. I know but one true wretchedness—the want of work (want of wages is comparativly trifling), which want, however, in such a world as this planet of ours, cannot be permanent unless we continue blind therein.—Carlyle's Letters.

IT might be supposed that as in the philosophy of Jesus poverty was equivalent to virtue, and misery a passport to eternal bliss, sickness would also be a beatific state. But Jesus, like the other Jews, believed that disease proceeded from sin. In Palestine it was always held that a priest or a prophet was the best physician, and prayer, with the laying on of hands, the most efficacious of all medicins. Among the sins of Asa it is mentioned that, having sore feet, he went to a doctor instead of to the Lord. Jesus informed them on whom he laid his hands that their sins were forgiven them, and warned those he healed to sin no more, lest a worse thing should come upon them. Such theological practioners hav always existed in the East, and exist there at the present day. A text from the Koran, written on a board, and washed off into a cup of water, is considered god's own physic, and as the patient believes in it, and the mind can sometimes influence the body, the disease is occasionally healed upon the spot. The exploits of the miracle doctor are exaggerated in his life time, and after his death it is declared that he (1) restored sight to men that were born blind, (2) cleansed the lepers, (3) made the lame to walk, (4) cured the incurable, and (5) raised the dead to life.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

JEFFREY frankly admitted that he disliked the wrangling to which Carlyle treated him. Never having had much of a creed himself, he thought he had daily less; and having no tendency to dogmatism, and no impatience of indecision, he thought zeal for [or against] creeds, and anxiety about positiv opinions, more and more ludicrous. In fact, he regarded discussions which aimed at more than exercising the faculties and exposing intolerances, very tiresome and foolish.—Froude's Life of Carlyle.

FOR forms of government let fools contest,
Whate'er is best administered is best;
For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight,
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right.
—Pope.

To a person uninstructed in natural history, his country or seaside stroll is a walk through a gallery filled with wonderful works of art, nine-tenths of which hav their faces turned to the wall. Teach him something of natural history, and you place in his hands a catalog of those which are worth turning round. Surely our innocent pleasures are not so abundant in this life that we can afford to despise this or any other source of them. We should fear being banished for our neglect to that limbo where the great Florentine tells us are those who, during this life, "wept when they might be joyful."—Huxley's Lay Sermons.

THE fact that Christ lived in Palestine does not tend to show that he was in any way related to the Holy Ghost; nor does the existence of the Christian religion substantiate the ascension of Jesus Christ. We all admit that Socrates lived in Athens, but we do not admit that he had a familiar spirit. I am satisfied that John Wesley was an Englishman, but I hardly believe that God postponed a rain because Mr. Wesley wanted to preach. All the natural things in the world are not sufficient to establish the supernatural.—Ingersoll.

THE BARTHOLDI STATUE.

The land, that, from the rule of kings,
In freeing us, itself made free,
Our old world sister to us brings
Her sculptured dream of liberty.

Unlike the shapes on Egypt's sands
Uplifted by the toil-worn slave,
On Freedom's soil with freemen's hands
We rear the symbol free hands gave.

O France, the beautiful! to thee
Once more a debt of love we owe;
In peace beneath thy fleur-de-lis,
We hail a later Rochambeau!

Rise, stately symbol! holding forth
Thy light and hope to all who sit
In chains and darkness! Belt the earth
With watch-fires from thy torch uplit!

Reveal the primal mandate still
Which Chaos heard and ceased to be,
Trace on mid-air th' eternal will
In signs of fire: "Let man be free!"

Shine far, shine free, a guiding light
To Reason's ways and Virtue's aim,
A lightning flash the wretch to smite
Who shields his license with thy name!
—John Greenleaf Whittier.

Odds and Ends.

A WILL with a codicil is an old testament and a new testament, but it isn't a Bible.

THE Roman empire declined and fell. In this respect it differs from a man. If he declines, he won't fall.

"HAV you license in Pennsylvania?" asked a Buffalo young lady, deeply interested in temperance work, of a Pittsburgh visitor. "License!" replied the latter, "I should just think we had. Why, you can't even get married without one."

CHRONOLOGY.—Old gentleman (putting a few questions): "Now, boys—ah—can any of you tell me what Commandment Adam broke when he took the forbidden fruit?" Small scholar (like a shot): "Please, sir, th' worn't no Commandments then, sir!"

RETURNED missionary (who piles it on pretty thick): "I was once captured by cannibals, and thought my time had come at last. Just as they were about putting me in a huge caldron of boiling water, I tripped up the two guards, and started on a race for life. I ran steadily for three days and three nights before I distanced the last of my blood-thirsty pursuers." Little Johnny (disgusted): "Why didn't you stand your ground, and whip the whole settlement single-handed, as you did the other times?" Returned missionary (turning it off): "Oh, I was afraid of getting in a stew, my young friend."

"HER majesty," writes a London correspondent, "eats at state dinners without gloves." The reason for that is at once apparent. It enables her majesty to get a better grip on the wing of a chicken. In wrestling with the common hen of commerce at the dinner table, she must be handled without gloves, or the battle is lost. Gloves would also be very much in the way when her majesty desired to clutch an ear of corn by each end, the tip and the lobe, so to speak, while she gnawed at it amidships. You see, there are a hundred emergencies that might arise during the progress of a state dinner wherein gloves would be in the way.

THE father of the family stands in a threatening attitude, thoughtfully trimming the larger knots off a nice long birchen rod. Before him, trembling, his darling son, never dearer than now, in his twelfth year, and but recently in mischief. The son, breaking the silence, which had grown painfully embarrassing, speaks: "Father, the preacher 's in the parlor talking to sister Sophia about joining the church, the baby 's sound asleep, and mamma 's lying down with a headache. Can't we compromise this thing some way for the sake of harmony within the party?" And white-winged peace stole softly into that room, and folding her snowy pinions, sat down on a hassock as though she intended to stay there until she hatched out a Turkish lounge.

THE champion liar hails from Pike county, Ind., and the following yarn is probably the greatest effort of his life: "A young lady who was watching my binding harvester at work, fell upon the table and was carried up with the grain. As the girl was about the size of a bundle, the machine did not recognize the difference, and so she came through with a neat little string around her waist. One of the harvest hands caught her as the machine 'kicked' her out, and set her on the ground right side up, when it was found that she had been more frightened than hurt." Now, if this veracious agriculturist had only added that the machine threshed the young woman, and shook from her face the flour without which no self-respecting young woman's toilet is complete, and barreled said flour for market by the aid of the young woman's hoops, his story would possess a completeness and symmetry which would cause it to pass current everywhere as a great unapproachable work of art.

FAR in the deep where darkness dwells,
A land of horror and despair,
Justice has built a dismal hell,
And laid her stores of vengeance there.

Eternal plagues, and heavy chains,
Tormentiug racks and fiery coals,
And darts to inflict immortal pains,
Dipped in the blood of damned souls!

There Satan; the first sinner, lies,
And roars and bites his iron bands,
In vain the rebel strives to rise,
Crush'd with the weight of both thy hands.

There guilty ghosts of Adam's race
Shriek out and howl beneath thy rod.
Once they could scorn a savior's grace,
But they incensed a dreadful God.

Tremble, my soul, and kiss the son,
Sinner, obey the savior's call;
Else your damnation hastens on,
And hell gapes wide to wait your fall!
—I. Watts, Humorist.

"How shall we reach the masses?" asks a religious paper. Dear brother, you can best reach them with a spoon. Go for them with a knife and fork. Humanity's tender point is its paunch. The conscience of man may be seared as with a a hot iron, but his maw is ever open to impressions. His intellect may be stunted, but his appetite is a giant. Take him to the concert or the theater, and he comes away to seek the nearest feeding place, where he may gorge himself before he sleeps. The little struggling church that bankrupts itself still further by venturing on a lecture course, finally lifts itself clear out of debt by a series of suppers. A man who will not pay fifty cents for a book will dump one dollar and fifty cents' worth of dinner into his system. A picnic without ten parts of feed to one part of band is a flat failure. When we "receive" a distinguished guest we feed him; when we say "good-bye" to an eminent citizen we giv him something to eat. We hav a feast for the wedding guests, luncheon for the watchers, and a light collation for the mourners. There are a thousand restaurants to one library, yea, more. By and by, if the principles of evolution be true, this world will be peopled by a race of stomachs with legs and arms. The legs will be needed to carry the stomach to the trough, and the arms to fill it up.

A TRIAL OF FAITH.

Notes and Clippings.

WARD, the Socialist, who was arrested in Trafalgar Square, London, on the 9th inst., was fined ten shillings for disturbing the peace.

THE Supreme Court at San Francisco, Cal., has just rendered a decision that marriage under assumed names does not invalidate the contract nor leave the parties free to marry under their true names.

THE Vatican is preparing for publication an encyclical letter condemning the Italian government, whose policy, the letter will say, places the pope in the power of a revolution which menaces his liberty.

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES is justly annoyed at the fact that he has been quoted in a Boston paper as saying that Emerson came from the "dirtiest" instead of the "daintiest sectarian circle of the time."

A MAN out in Omaha, afflicted with corpulency, tried the faith cure and has reduced his weight seventy-five pounds. He had to attend service three times a day, and the church was two miles away.

THE pastor of a Boston church, it is said, recently gave out the hymn beginning, "I love to steal awhile away," and the Sunday-school superintendent took it as a personal reflection and resigned his charge.

MR. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, in some remarks before the Unitarian Club in Boston on a late occasion, said, "The problem of religion to-day is to translate the religion of the parlor into the language of the shop; to take it out of the hands of gentlemen and put it into the hands of men."

A CONVENTION of Presbyterians at Pittsburg, Pa., last week passed a resolution to the effect that organ music in churches is "without the authority of divine appointment under the New Testament dispensation."

A LYNN clergyman relates that on one occasion, after marrying a couple, an envelope was handed to him which he supposed, of course, contained the marriage fee. On opening it he found a slip of paper on which was written: "We desire your prayers."

THIEVES broke into the Methodist and Episcopal churches in Hempstead, L. I., a few nights ago. Finding nothing that they considered worth taking away, they drank the communion wine and departed. As the thieves are still at large, the efficacy of the dose has not been noted.

PROF. R. A. PROCTOR, the astronomer, writes to the St. Louis Globe-Democrat that the angel with the drawn sword in midair over Jerusalem, as mentioned in the Bible, was probably a comet. The professor is moved to make this suggestion by the Globe-Democrat's compositor making Peter speak of a "comet" where Mr. Proctor wrote "event" in a previous article.

A BUCKINGHAM (England) farmer has just presented his first-born for christening at his parish church with twenty-six Christian names from the scripture, and representing every letter of the alphabet. The names commenced with Abel and ended with Zachariah. It was only with the greatest difficulty that the clergyman persuaded the farmer to content himself with the first and last of the appellations proposed. The surname of the infant is Jenkins.

ARTHUR BUIES, editor of the Montreal, Can., Lanterne, is reported to have been excommunicated by the Catholic church. His offense was attacking the Roman Catholic hierarchy and its teachings. He urged the confiscation of church property and that marriage should be made a civil contract in Canada as in France and the United States.

THE Rev. E. A. Farmer, of Plainwell, Mich., is an enthusiastic Prohibitionist. In a recent sermon he said: "Any Christian who refuses to vote the Prohibition ticket ought to be yoked to the devil and made to toil for a thousand years on the hot pavements of hell." This was too strong for his flock, and the Rev. Farmer will be asked to resign.

THE Young Men's Christian Association is considered a good business investment in many Western towns. The Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad contributes $1,000 a year to the association at Topeka, besides contributing liberally to the association in Kansas City. In San Francisco, Wells, Fargo & Co. make their employes members of the association at an annual expense of $250.

M. PAUL BERT, French minister resident in Annam, who was reported to be critically ill with fever, died Nov. 11th. Prime Minister de Freycinet announced M. Bert's death in the Chamber of Deputies, and that body at once adjourned. M. Bert was long professor of physiology in the faculty of science at Bordeaux, and achieved a high reputation in the scientific world. He was elected to the National Assembly in 1871, and ten years later was appointed minister of public instruction. He wrote much on scientific topics. He was fifty-three years old.

THE Rev. Mr. Inglis is a Presbyterian minister of Toronto in good standing, who is editorially connected with the Toronto Globe. Not long ago a Presbyterian paper of Toronto printed an article in which it was stated that all writers for secular newspapers are liars; and Mr. Inglis, thinking that this was a reflection on him, brought the matter up in the Presbyterian Synod. But nothing came of it, and the reverend gentleman is still waiting for a vindication.

THOMAS CARLYLE told this story in one of his letters: Stupid boys are a dreadful curse; and foolish mothers often make it worse; there is no remedy but patience; let things take their train without struggling too fiercely against them; you will find it best. There is a test, not quite scriptural, but which suits you exactly in its purport. A minister in the Middlebie pulpit was attempting to preach upon these words: "He that is unholy, let him be unholy still." The poor man, as you know, perhaps, could do nothing but repeat and re-repeat the verse, "He that is un—," etc., having totally forgotten the beginning of his sermon. An upland proprietor listened to him with increasing impatience, reiterating the words, till at length another He that is unholy drove the worthy Laird out of all composure; he started up, squeezed on his hat, and stalked gruffly along the passage, muttering: "He that is a confounded Jackass, let him be a Jackass still!" There is much truth in that prayer, much good sense.

Earthquakes and Volcanoes.

The recent earthquake in Charleston has caused considerable excitement in this country. People look upon it as a great disaster, and so it was; but when we come to compare it with some other disasters of the same kind that hav taken place within the past 255 years, this earthquake is hardly worth mentioning. People read the accounts of these disasters in other countries where they are frequent, and soon forget all about them. Then, again, the mass of the people are so ignorant of the extent of damage done and the great amount of human lives lost by these earthquakes and volcano eruptions, I thought an interesting article could be written on the subject. If you think my efforts to interest the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER hav not failed, you can giv them the benefit of my researches into the subject, and then, I think, they will agree with me that the causes of earthquakes are not from the elements above the earth or the slipping of the land underneath, as some would-be professors, or, in other words, cranks, hav stated, but that it is, as we learn from a study of geology, caused by the pent-up vapors and gases from the internal fires of the earth.

In 1631 the volcano Vesuvius burst out, and sent a stream of lava down its sides which destroyed Resina; again, in 1784, Vesuvius destroyed Torredal Greco, and 400 persons lost their lives. Again, in 1822, this volcano burst out with an awful explosion, which blew out the crater, 2,000 feet deep, and blew off more than 800 feet of the top of the mountain.

In 1669 Etna belched forth lava which overwhelmed fourteen towns and villages before reaching Catania, the walls of which were 60 feet high. It accumulated until it reached the top of the wall; it then poured over and destroyed a part of the city. It flowed on for 15 miles further to the sea, with a depth of 40 feet. Again, in 1819, this volcano burst out, and a stream of lava flowed from it for nine months.

In 1692 an earthquake destroyed three-fourths of the city of Port Royal, in Jamaica. The land swelled and heaved like the waves of a sea. Mountains 8,000 feet high were rent and shattered.

November 1, 1755, an earthquake occurred at Lisbon, and in six minutes the greater part of the city was destroyed, and 60,000 inhabitants perished. The sea was greatly agitated, and many boats and small vessels were destroyed. The shock was felt almost all over the whole earth. Mountains in Portugal were split in two, and portions of them thrown into the valley below.

Springs throughout Europe became hot. A village in Morocco, Africa, was engulfed, with about ten thousand persons.

In 1772 Papandayang, a lofty volcano in Java, while in eruption fell in and disappeared with its inhabitants, for a space of fifteen miles long and six wide.

In 1783 there were 349 earthquake shocks felt in Italy. On March 28th all the towns and villages around the city of Oppido for twenty-two miles in every direction were destroyed; the earth heaved and rolled so that people experienced the sensation of seasickness.

In 1783 the volcano Skaptar Jokul burst out, and two streams of lava flowed off in opposit directions. One of them was forty miles long and seven wide, the other fifty miles long and twelve wide. About 1,300 persons lost their lives; 20,000 horses, 7,000 cattle, and 130,000 sheep were destroyed.

In 1811 South Carolina was shaken up by an earthquake which extended up the Mississippi valley. The earth opened in many places, and lakes 20 miles long were formed and others were drained.

On April 5th, 1815, an eruption occurred in the mountain Tomboro in the island of Lumbawa. It continued until July. The explosion from this eruption was heard 970 miles away. Out of a population of 12,000 only 26 survived. Violent whirlwinds caused by this eruption carried men, horses, cattle, and everything else into the air. Large trees were torn up by the roots, and the sea was covered for many miles with floating timber. The ashes fell a distance of 300 miles away. Floating cinders two feet thick fell on the ocean for several miles, through which ships passed with difficulty. Day was converted into the darkest night by the fall of these ashes and cinders.

On Jan. 16, 1819, an earthquake occurred which submerged the village of Lindre, sinking 2,000 square miles of land, and water arising in the place of the land.

On May 30, 1840, the volcano Kilanea, in the Sandwich Islands, commenced to pour out its lava. It flowed for three weeks. The stream of lava was from 1 to 5 miles wide and 40 miles long to the sea, and a half-mile wide where it entered the sea. The depth of the stream was from 100 to 200 feet. Hills were melted down like snow, and forests fell like grass in a prairie fire. The coast was extended a quarter of a mile into the sea, and the ocean was heated for twenty miles along the coast. The light of this volcano could be seen 100 miles at sea, and fine print could be read 40 miles out at sea by night.

In 1877 the volcano Cotopax had an eruption that destroyed, by an upheaval of water, 1,000 persons. This volcano is 19,000 feet high; the force required to raise lava to the top of the volcano is ten tons per square inch, yet it has been known to project matter 6,000 feet above the top of this volcano, and it once threw a stone weighing 200 tons a distance of nine miles.

Here we hav accounts of some twenty towns, villages, and cities that hav been destroyed by earthquakes and volcano eruptions, where the loss of life is not known. The list of lives lost by earthquake and volcano, where the number is given, amounts thus far to 84,674. I will now continue the list of the principal earthquakes up to the present time without going into details:

In 1822	earthquake in	Aleppo destroyed	30,000
In 1850	"	at Naples "	6,000
In 1851	"	in Italy "	14,000
In 1857	"	" "	22,000
In 1859	"	at Quito, Peru "	5,000
In 1860	"	at Mandoja "	7.000
In 1863	"	at Phillipine Islands destroyed	10.000
In 1868	"	in Peru destroyed	25,000
In 1879	"	in Persia "	1.000
In 1881	"	in Scio "	8.000
In 1883	"	in Island of Ischa destroyed	2,000
In 1883	"	at Asia Minor destroyed	57
In 1883	volcano in	Java destroyed	100,000

The earthquake at Asia Minor rendered 14,678 persons homeless.

The recent earthquake in Charleston destroyed some 50 persons, and many hav died since from exposure.

Here we hav a list of 230,107 more lives lost in this way, making a total of 314,781. Now, if we could know the number of lives lost by the destruction of those towns, where the loss of life is not given, I hav no doubt the number would reach 400,000 lives lost in this way within the past 255 years.

The recent earthquake in Java split a mountain 7,000 feet high into seven parts. I hav seen it stated that the recent shock in Charleston damaged church buildings to the amount of more than $1,000,000.

Now I wish to ask my Christian friends if this does not look as if the Lord had not much respect for the institution which is dedicated to his praise. Also does it look as though he had any respect for his children either, to allow such needless destruction of human life? Why not ordain that all should liv to a good old age, and die a natural death after a life of usefulness? Do not say he cannot prevent these things as long as you claim he can create worlds at will.

If there be such a God as you claim, and he can prevent such disasters as are daily taking place, and will not, then I wish to know what fiend could be or do worse; if he cannot prevent such disasters, then I fail to see wherein he is a God of any power. In either case I cannot see wherein such a God as the Christians claim is worthy of the worship of man.

Cincinnati, O., Nov. 1, 1886. C. D. WALLACE.

Sunday Laws and the Late Election.

During last winter the reverends and their dupes were fanatical in their attempts to enforce the unjust, inequitable, and infamous Christian Sunday laws in St. Joseph, Mo.

At the January term of the circuit court there were 283 indictments found against the people by a bigoted and prejudiced grand jury, that old religious relic of the British Star Chamber court.

The reverend intimidators raved like madmen. They imported Sam Jones, at an immense outlay of money, and threatened to crush out all human freedom—convert Sundays into dead days, except for libeling the dead friends of humanity, slandering the good, and blaspheming the great motiv power, the law governing the universe on Sundays as on all other days.

It seemed that human liberty, freedom, right, good, justice, equity—everything tending to elevate, educate, enlighten, improve, and make humanity better—had been destroyed, overthrown; and that evil, tyranny, ignorance, bigotry, and the combined enemies of mankind had triumphed, gained the ascendency, and were riding roughshod in corruption over the innocents in the once fair temple of liberty, headed by Christian priests. The sheriff of our county made himself especially obnoxious to the people by his subserviency to the Pharisees. He was put forward on the regular Democratic state, Congressional, and county ticket for Buchanan county, Mo., and every candidate on that ticket was elected by large majorities, except this candidate for sheriff, who was beaten by the people's and workingmen's candidate, Joseph Andriano, by a majority of over two hundred.

This shows what an outraged people can do, and what they will do in vindication of freedom and the right when driven to the wall by a lazy and useless reverend priesthood.

The case of the young woman who was attacked by a maddened heifer in the cattle-yard, on Friday morning last, has attracted considerable attention. The brute attempted to gore her, but the young woman seized her by the horns, and, while dragged and trampled and bruised and painfully injured, the girl cried lustily for help, but no human, saint, angel, son, virgin, or mother of God, nor God himself, heard her, or if hearing her, heeded not her cries for aid; but a kindly-disposed cow in the yard attacked the infuriated heifer, and kept it up until she compelled it to turn to defend itself against the cow, and by this stratagem the girl was enabled to escape, thus proving that a beast—a poor brute of a cow—was more kind and useful than all the special providences and gods in the universe—more of a savior for this girl, though of great courage and presence of mind in persisting in the effort to preserve her life against the superior force of the heifer, than all the crucified saviors of the religious world.

So with this sheriff. When the conflict came on with an aroused people, God and savior, saints and the church militant, all went down before this people. Prestige, prayers, prejudice, combined with religion and despotism, all melted down before a courageous people resolved to be free. P. V. WISE.

Pious Cant in Politics.

In one of his speeches for Mr. George, in New York, Mr. Powderly gave utterance to this rash thought: "I agree with Henry George that all men should hav those things that God ordained they should hav." Such radicalism roots out all resistance. It remained for Mr. George to reply that he agreed with Mr. Powderly that "men should not hav that which God ordained that they should not hav," and harmony between the two would hav been complete, but Mr. George lost his opportunity.

It is just to Mr. Powderly to say that he does not often offend with utterly empty phrases like the one we quote, but the trick of the platform builders, and those who undertake to make people think that fine words butter their parsnips, needs exposure none the less. And the flippant introduction of "God" into all sorts of political oratory is even more reprehensible. Above all things deliver the labor cause from pulpit cant and the old rags of theological discourse.

If Mr. Powderly and the rest of the pious politicians will observe things as they are, they will see that "God" is always on the side of the strongest, and helps only those who help themselvs, having apparently "ordained" that men should hav those things which they can get, without regards to methods used in getting them. So the introduction of "God" into politics and other affairs, while it may weaken the thoughtless by making them less self-reliant, does not strengthen the thoughtful or encourage the despondent. It means nothing, or else, worse than nothing, that in the work in hand the strong shall triumph over the weak and then devour them, this being the divine method of settling all differences, without regard to such purely human considerations as right and justice.

Mr. George's seventy thousand votes are of more account than all the gods that George or Powderly can invoke, but this does not destroy the force of Powderly's remark or dim the luster of his wonderful discovery that men should hav those things which they should hav, leaving out of the question the possibly unimportant fact that in determining what are the things that men should hav and what are the things they should not hav, all differences of opinion arise and all contests, political or other, hav their cause.—Winsted Press.

Mr. Bowman's Epigrams.

If lies would choke a man, we would hav no preachers.

According to the Bible, which is the devil—Jehovah or Satan?

Old maids who can't get anyone else to love can fall back on Jesus.

It is hard to believe anything in this age when people buy their beauty at the store, wear false hair, eat with false teeth, and hav a false religion.

'Twas by wrong they conquered all, and by right that they shall fall. Their sweet by-and-by all depends upon a lie. GEORGE W. BOWMAN.

A Syllogism.

"Whoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell-fire" (Christ, Luke v, 12).

"But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee" (Christ, Luke xii, 20).

"Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die" (Paul, 1 Cor. xv, 36).

Whover says to another, "Thou fool," is in danger of hell-fire.

Christ, or God—or both—and Paul did say, "Thou fool!" to others. Therefore—what? The reader can work out the syllogism to suit himself.—Investigator.

The American Secular Union.

The Congress of the American Secular Union.

The delegates and audience were slow in getting into Chickering Hall Thursday, the 11th, and when Colonel Ingersoll ascended the platform at 10 o'clock, only about a dozen people were in the seats in front. Mr. Ingersoll promptly adjourned the meeting till 3:30 P.M. to giv the folks time to find the hall. After he left the audience came, and went, and came again at 3:30 P M.

The carefully prepared program of the secretary was useless. It had been intended to get through a good portion of the business on Thursday, but it was not done. At the time appointed for the afternoon session about three or four hundred were in the hall. Colonel Ingersoll, accompanied by Mrs. Ingersoll, and one of his daughters, was on time, and took the chair. A speech from him at this time was not on the program, and when he stood up, he said afterward, he did not intend to speak a minute. His appearance was greeted with hearty and sincere applause. At his first word the house was still. As he spoke the loving appreciation of the audience seemed to urge him on, and, regardless of his physical infirmity, he gave the audience one of his splendid addresses. "We hav met," he said, "for the purpose of comparing experiences and ascertaining whether we hav advanced during the past year, and whether our cause has a better chance of succeeding now than one year ago

"Everyone should choose to be governed by his own mistakes rather than by the ignorance of others. Man has braved public opinion, endured every possible form of torture, braved every kind of contempt and scorn through ages. And we ought not to expect people to advance too rapidly. They are weighted by hereditary vices that they call virtues. They hav a respect for the past that is a contempt for the present. We hav had to war with aggregated capital. As a rule, institutions hav influence according to their wealth, because, as a rule, men kneel according to their wants, and he who fills the palm of beggary controls the beggar, at least while looking at him. I say that no gift of money to an institution which carries with it an obligation to teach the superstitions of the donor should ever be accepted. It is a curse and not a benefit. Some one left money to Andover seminary poisoned with the condition that the mistakes of the donor should be perpetuated. Now arises in the history of that institution the question whether it shall lose the money, or whether, on the other hand, it shall teach what we know are lies, out of pure economy. Missionaries were sent to India to instruct the poor, ignorant Hindoos that if they would become Christian men and women they would afterwards be changed to winged creatures in heaven. If they refused to believe the scriptures, they would go to hell. The poor, miserable heathen wanted to know what had become of their fathers and mothers, and the missionaries were happy to inform them that they were down in hell. The result was that those missionaries didn't hav very good luck. The Hindoos preferred their own heaven to an English paradise, and all their friends in a hot place. Some missionaries dared to suggest that there might be an appeal to a higher court, and a new trial for the Hindoo fathers and mothers, and that maybe they would not stay in hell after all. These men are now on trial before the Andover board of executors There is an illustration of the poisonous burdens with which donations are weighed down. Here in this city is another, right over in Stuyvesant Park. Its gates are closed, and the women and children driven out at sunset. The key is turned by a Dutchman who died two hundred years ago. These things ought not to be. Let the dead take care of themselvs and not impose any burden on the living. When we go from here we abdicate in favor of the babes who follow us. Let us leave no grievous restrictions on their action.

"Every one sees that the old monarchies are dying out. The people, after centuries of oppression, are slowly but surely crowding the kings from their thrones and the crowns from their brows. Politically, the world has passed its midnight. It is growing wiser. People are beginning to recognize the fact that there is no direct providence; that God answers one prayers as he does the other—by not answering either. The infinit being is simply a phantom which men hav created out of ignorance and fear, and, in some cases, love. I don't want to hurt the feelings of the thousands who honor and love such a being. I'd like to know that for every tear shed by the suffering poor there is in store a sacred joy. I'm willing to hope for the best. But I want to see that hope at every grave. I do not want to hear a devil hissing like a snake in the mourner's ear, 'There is a world of torment for you.' We ought to get all the happiness we can out of this world, and leave the next—or the next two—to take care of themselvs. So far as I'm concerned I wouldn't swap off the society of one being I love for the society of the whole Trinity in the next world.

"Look how our Christian community prevents discussion of the inspiration of the scripture. In many of our states you cannot open your mouth to say you don't believe the Bible is inspired without opening the door of a prison. The army of thousands of gigantic intellects called ministers cannot answer an argument against their religion except by a sheriff! All the ministers I know are apologizing for their Bible. They are ashamed of it. Why don't they tax the churches? A man who works for a dollar a day builds a hut worth a few hundred dollars, and he pays roundly in taxes to support the flag that flies above it and for the government that protects it. I think God ought to pay his taxes, too. I would impose no burden on the devout men who spend their money in preaching what they believe to be a divine religion to the poor. But when they go into the dome business they ought to pay. The cathedral worth millions, with its gold and silks and colors in the walls, ought to pay taxes while the home of the laboring man does. All forms of oaths in courts should be abolished. The oath as now administered puts all men on a par before a jury. The rascal kisses the book and forms a temporary partnership with God. His word alone is good for nothing; but the jury credit the firm. The marriage laws of New York, and of many of our states, would disgrace a tribe of savages. No gentleman wants a woman to liv with him any longer than she cares to stay. Yet the church decrees that she can be loosed from the bonds for only one cause, and the law of New York shuts out every other ground for divorce. I believe in the sanctity of marriage. It is a contract that should always be made public, to end only when one of the parties is covered under the sod, but there should be release from its obligations when they are galling to either of the parties. To keep together a man and a woman who hate each other is to lower the standard of morality in the coming race."

At the conclusion of Colonel Ingersoll's address, adjournment was taken to 8 o'clock in the evening, when to a very fine audience, Vice-President T. B. Wakeman, delivered his lecture on "Liberty, Science, and Humanity."

The first business session of the Congress opened Friday morning. Vice-President Watts in the chair. A Committee on Credentials was chosen. This consisted of C. B. Reynolds, A. C. Macdonald, and E. A. Stevens. The Committee reported as follows:

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON CREDENTIALS.

Your Committee on Credentials beg leave to report that the following named persons are entitled to seats and votes in this Congress:

Austin, Williamson, N. Y.

The Secretary next read his report as follows:

REPORT OF SECRETARY.

The main work done by the American Secular Union during the past year is as follows:

1. The effort for the opening of the museums in Central Park on Sunday. This is the most important effort ever made in that direction, and created wide discussion and interest. A petition was circulated, to which over ten thousand names were attached of the officers of the city government, judges of the courts, business and professional men, including some clergymen, and thousands of the working people. The petition represented the almost universal sentiment of the city, and, with but few exceptions, was supported by the secular press. Resolutions were passed by various labor organizations in this city, the voice of a hundred thousand workingmen heartily advocating the Sunday opening. The petition was presented to the trustees of the museums, together with an address, which has been published in pamphlet form. The secretary was not allowed to speak in person before the trustees, and therefore he was obliged to send his argument in writing. Up to the present time no answer has been received to the petition and the address. If the museums were entirely under the control of the city, they would be opened without delay. But they are partly private institutions, originally started by individuals, represented by a board of trustees, and, by contract with the city, this board has the power to open or shut. At present the board is orthodox, and apparently neglectful of the public demand, and unless they consent there is no way to compel them to do so, except by withdrawing all municipal support whatsoever for the maintenance of the museums, except on condition that they be opened on Sundays. This is the next step to be taken. We hav respectfully petitioned the trustees, we hav appealed to their sense of justice, and without avail. They hav given no answer to the voice of the people. They are silent. The only possible course now to adopt is to say to the trustees of these institutions: "It is not right, so long as you disregard the wishes of the vast majority of the citizens, to giv your institution any support out of the funds of the city raised by taxation. You are practically allied with the church, and in this case, as in all others, there must be a total separation of church and state. That which is paid for by all the people should be for the benefit of all the people." Agitation on this principle will be continued until the museums are open on Sunday or they become no longer public institutions, supported by the public treasury. Private institutions can be conducted as their owners desire, but public institutions, supported by taxation, should not be under the control of a private corporation. The commonwealth which pays the money should exercise the control.

In regard, therefore, to the opening of the museums on Sunday the secretary reports progress, but progress that shall not cease until justice is established.

2. The next effort of the Secular Union for the accomplishment of its purpose has been in regard to church taxation. A bill was introduded into the legislature at Albany for impartial taxation, by the Brooklyn Constitutional Club. The bill was lying inanimate in the committee room with but little prospect of discussion. The secretary went to Albany, conferred with members of the legislature, conferred also with the members of the Brooklyn Constitutional Club, called a meeting of the representativs of this club, of the New York State Freethinkers' Association, and the Secular Union, and arrangements were made for a thorough debate of the bill in the committee, and for a decided effort to bring it before the legislature for action. This latter could not for the present be accomplished; the committee refused to report, but the discussion in the committee has been published in the pamphlet, "Impartial Taxation," and this is a most valuable campaign document. It contains important facts and arguments in regard to church taxation.

On this point also the secretary reports progress, but progress of great significance.

3. In accordance with the instructions of the Congress, which included work in the field, the secretary devoted himself constantly to lecturing for seven months in the states of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, and Colorado, and the territories of Wyoming, Utah, Idaho, and Montana. He traveled over ten thousand miles, delivered one hundred and forty-six lectures, and organized twelve new societies. Nearly one hundred of these lectures were given in places where no Freethought lectures had ever been given before. Of course, under such circumstances, it cannot be expected that there would be a great pecuniary return. The total amount raised during the trip was $1,262. The expenses for railroad fare, hotels, hall rent, advertising, etc., were $882, leaving $380, above these necessary expenses, not including the salary of the secretary for the time being. The work accomplished by the secretary must be looked upon not simply for its present influence, but for its promis, for the way that is now open for still greater and more remunerativ work in the future. It should be judged, not as a completed work, but as the beginning of what is to be pursued for a series of years. The present result is cheering, but when we think of what may be done on the basis of this year's work, the outlook is indeed radiant with hope. It needs but courage, patience, and energy, and the great West will be ablaze with Liberalism in the next quarter of a century.

The lecture work need not be stated in detail. In the letters written weekly to THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator all information that might interest the general Liberal public is given, and the meaning and breadth of the work made known.

These letters, consisting of three or four columns, written every week from various points, form a part of the report of the secretary. This correspondence has been a valuable portion of the labors of the secretary. The letters hav been widely read; hav helped to make acquaintance and sympathy throughout the land; hav brought Liberals into more intimate association, so that unity has become more expressiv and a source of strength to all the scattered forces of Freethought. Thus the trip was made serviceable by both the platform and the pen.

The secretary has also entered into correspondence with several hundred Liberals throughout the country, and in this way also the spirit of fraternity has been maintained.

Sixteen new societies hav been formed, sixteen life members added, and five hundred and two annual members.

The work of the last year has thus been an advance. Something has been accomplished. The Union occupies a better position to-day than it did one year ago. It has lost nothing, and it has gained. There has been a year of growth, and the secretary presents his report with the assurance that the work begun need only be prosecuted from year to year with unabating energy to be preëminently successful.

The secretary would call attention to a few points:

(1) The work of the Union has been peculiar. It has encroached upon no other province. It has not prevented activity in other directions. It has not done that which would hav been done had there been no American Secular Union. It has simply filled a vacant place. The work of the past year of the Union would not hav been done without the Union. If one admits the value of the work accomplished, then he must admit the value and necessity of the Union through whose existence alone and method of action the work could hav been achieved. Had it not been for the national organization, the effort for the opening of the museums on Sunday would not hav been made; there would hav been no discussion of the bill for impartial taxation in the committee and the publication of the arguments; there would hav been no pioneer lecture trip, where nearly one hundred lectures hav been delivered in places where Freethought has never been publicly declared before; there would not hav been the large acquaintance among the Liberals of the land which now exists through the weekly correspondence in the Freethought journals. All the rest of the Liberal work might hav been done, the same as it is now, but the work of the Union during the past year would not hav been done, but would hav been absolutely undone. The Union has accomplished a peculiar and unprecedented task in the movement of Freethought in America.

The wisdom of sticking to the Nine Demands as the basis of work has been sufficiently vindicated. There is no better fighting ground. On that success is sure. Beyond that as an organization the Union cannot go. Whatever may be the opinion of its individuals on the thousand subjects that occupy the attention of the human mind, it is affirmed that this basis of work is destructiv and not constructiv. In this lies the very strength and imperious necessity of the Union. Art is long and time is short, the poet says. Construction or art, which is building, requires centuries for its unfoldment. It transcends all organization. It requires a thousand agencies. It cannot be hurried. Human will, like the waves of the sea, makes only a part of the great deep of its infinit advance. It defies calculation and oversweeps the mightiest wisdom of the brain. The constructiv forces of human society are simply countless; they are varied. They spring from a million motivs. They cannot be caught and analyzed. They are for beauty as well as for truth. It requires time, evolut on. for the broad basis of constructiv fellowship to be established. And we must leave to these the establishment of its successful instrumentalities. At present it is impossible to formulate a creed or choose its method.

It is the destructiv work of to-day that is the vital force of the constructiv work of the future. For constructiv work to ignore the destructiv work is for the child to be ignorant of its mother. All the glory of the future is born of the ruin of to-day. The giant forces of Liberalism now are the forces that break down, are the forces that oppose injustice. superstition, and tyranny. They are the forces of war, and not of peace. Such are the Nine Demands. They seek the removal of wrong, of that which everybody knows to be wrong. There is no question in regard to the justness of our position. There is no division of sentiment, and can be none. When the battle is won our forces may scatter into different fields of effort, but on these points there is the most thorough and complete unanimity. There is no mental reservation. It is said our work is not permanent. We hope that it is not, that some day we shall win the victory aud disband our forces. But though our work, is not permanent, it is of vast magnitude. Accomplish our work and a mighty step is made in human advancement. Accomplish our work, and American liberty is forever secure.

Admit that our work is destructiv, it is still absolutely necessary, and so most noble in its meaning and power, and because destructiv, there is more vitality in it, as in the ranks of battle there is the most living unity of force. If not permanent, our work will last as long as we liv, and to accomplish these demands will be the greatest achievement that any of us can help to do in this transition age of the world.

It has been suggested that the Union should no longer be an activ institution, but that, after this two years' campaign. it now retire to inglorious ease. Its officers, it is said, should be scattered, instead of concentrated in one place, with opportunity for constant counsel. The secretary should be a home body, instead of a pioneer worker. He should stay at home and simply watch proceedings, and from time to time report progress. This might do if we had the elegant buildings of our orthodox adversaries—the sumptuous office-room, the gorgeous upholstery, the full coffers, and the lazy dignity of the missionaries of the cross. This is a nice arrangement for a millionaire corporation that can pay big salaries, and expect nothing in return, but it won't do for the American Secular Union. That is a fighting institution. To do battle is the very soul of its organization. To stay at home would be complete annihilation. The life of the Union is in its activity. The policy adopted at Cassadaga of employing a secretary who shall be exclusivly devoted to the Union—who shall traverse the whole field, and be present at all points, not as a looker on, but as a worker—has accomplished much that is valuable, and, with better organization, better knowledge and experience, far greater work can be done in the future.

It must be remembered that we are working against formidable odds, that any gain is a great gain amid so many adverse circumstances. Organized superstition is against us. The only way to meet it is by organized Liberalism. Mistakes may hav been made, but these can be rectified. Since we contend against injustice, the spirit of justice should prevail iu our own ranks. Though the work we engage in is destructiv, our methods should be thoroughly humanitarian. Coming together on this important occasion, reviewing the work of the past, considering what has been done, what may be done, no doubt we shall find a way to more effectual coöperation.

It has been suggested that the vice-presidents of the Association, carefully selected, should constitute a part of the the Board of Directors with the other officers of the Union. Such an arrangement might be for the greater usefulness and democratic power of the body.

It has also been suggested that the Congress, instead of meeting every year, should meet once in two years, as a matter of economy, considering the present reverses of Liberalism.

These and other points that may be suggested, it is hoped, will receive the amplest discussion and elucidation at this Congress.

E. A. Stevens moved that the secretary's report be received and referred to the Committee on Resolutions. J. D. Mallonee had a communication which he wished to read as an amendment to the report. The chair ruled it out of order. His communication was finally referred to the Committee on Resolutions.

In the absence of the treasurer Mr. Putnam read the treasurer's report.

The following committees were then appointed:

Auditing Committee.—C. A. Marshall, Charles Eckhard, C. P. Somerby, William Thorpe, Daniel E. Ryan. Mr. Somerby declined to serve.

Committee on Resolutions.—E. M. Macdonald, L. K. Washburn, Helen H. Gardener, Lucy N. Colman, E. B. Foote, Sen. Helen Gardener resigned.

Committee on Nominations.—E. A. Stevens, L. K. Washburn, A. C. Macdonald, C. B. Reynolds, S. R. Wetherill.

The chairman of the Executiv Committee then made the following report:

REPORT OF CHAIRMAN EXECUTIV COMMITTEE.

Before the aims and objects of the American Secular Union can be accomplished, the people must be educated to a knowledge of the justice of our claims, and more fully understand how the success of our association in securing the Nine Demands of Liberalism will promote their best interests by securing for all men, and all women with men, equal civil and religious rights, regardless of religious faith or the lack of it.

I accepted, when reëlected at your last Congress, the position of chairman of the Executiv Committee on the understanding that, if not fully one-half, at least a good proportion, of the funds raised should be devoted to the judicious circulation of Liberal literature, thus building up the cause in new fields, and aiding and encouraging the lonely ones in their efforts at propaganda work. I respectfully suggest that we need carefully prepared pamphlets, giving, in as concise form as possible, the historical facts, the evidences of the fallacies of the Old and New Testament; the true history of the actual effects of Christianity upon mankind from its first access to power in the days of Constantine to the present time; the proofs that Christianity utterly fails to meet the wants of the people, and incentivs to more useful, lovable, purer, and consequently happier lives. While the iconoclast work is absolutely essential, we must not rest content with tearing down the tottering hovels of superstition, but must build up goodly palaces with foundations of truth and reason in their stead. The judicious distribution of $5 worth of Liberal literature, the securing of one yearly subscriber to any of our best periodicals, will bring more intelligent persons to our views than any two lectures—save, of course, those of Colonel Ingersoll. When Colonel Ingersoll is announced to lecture, the people are prepared and all anxiety to hear him. This does not apply to any other Liberal lecturer. On the contrary, I think all hav at some time realized how worse than useless the outlay and labor of getting up a lecture in p aces where the people hav not first been aroused to interest in the subject by the distribution of Liberal literature. When, by reading, a demand to hear the living exponent of Secularism is created, there is very little trouble in obtaining funds, and good audiences are insured, and if a good, live, working local Liberal society, with science school on Sunday, is not organized, the fault is with the lecturer. How to provide this needed supply of suitable Liberal literature, and secure its judicious, thorough d s ribution, is a question of vital import. This claims, and I most respectfully solicit for it, the most earnest consideration of this Congress.

I deplore the fact that I cannot giv a very encouraging report of work accomplished during the past year. Justice compels me to inform you that the reason was not lack of willingness to work on my part, but absolute impossibility of obtaining funds, even sufficient to print by-law, hints and suggestions how to conduct local societies, duties of officers, and members of committees. In Michigan, Pennsylvania, and New York, wherever I hav organized local Liberal societies, I hav had to write out by-laws, hints, instructions, a tedious, laborious talk. I made most earnest appeals in the Board of Directors, and a resolution was passed that these necessary papers and suitable leaflets should be printed as soon as there was any available funds. I hav made many applications for this, but although the cost would be but trivial, the funds hav not been obtainable. The Truth Seeker Company generously offered toward the close of the year to print by-laws, instructions, etc., and donate them, but I did not feel that it would be justice to avail myself of their generosity. I would respectfully protest against being misunderstood. Every member of the Board of Directors was just as anxious for success as I was; each and every one of my colleagues had the interest of the cause at heart. Some, doubtless, had less high appreciation of leaflets and by-laws, and did not regard them as of such great importance as I do, but every officer of the American Secular Union has always been ready to do all in their power to help in any way whereby the cause could be advanced. Not the individuals, but the manner of doing the work, with all due deference to its authors and advocates, I claim, is lamentably at fault. And the results after two years of trial, at an expense of nearly nine thousand dollars, certainly pleads most earnestly for a change of methods, and will plead excuse for my suggesting a new departure for your consideration. In the Seventh Day Adventist ranks the ministers in leading positions are always expected and required to take the lead in self-sacrifice and bearing burdens. Those who most cheerfully do this are most beloved and respected, and after a few years are generously provided for.

It is impossible for the most able worker to be in two places at once, and I suggest there is palpable absurdity in having a secretary traveling immense distances to lecture, absent from headquarters three-fourths of the year. Necessarily while in one section lecturing, the other parts of the field suffer for lack of proper attention.

We need an office secretary, to hav constant care and watchfulness over the whole work. A secretary of untiring energy, persistent devotion to the cause, one wiling to work 365 days in the year, and, whenever necessary, half the nights also; who will study economy in expenditures of the funds of the society and his own, and be content, till the cause is built up, and can afford to pay fairer salary, to do all the work required for $500 per year.

The secretary should keep constantly posted as to the movements and whereabouts of all our Liberal lecturers. maintain correspondence with officers of every orgauized state and local society, and solicit correspondence with the lonely ones and all willing workers who desire to establish local Liberal societies in their neighborhood.

The secretary should hav charge of and furnish the leaflets, with hints and suggestions to those desirous of doing propaganda work.

When, after faithful distribution of Liberal literature, there is a desire expressed to hav a lecturer, the secretary should ascertain the amount friends can subscribe, and their first, second, and third choice of lecturers, communicate with the lecturer, then prepare a brief synopsis of the case, and take it to each of the executiv committee of the board of directors, and, on their sanction and advice, offer the lecturer then nearest to that place a specified sum, to deliver the needed course of lectures and organize society, giving lecturer option to accept a certain amount in full for services, and pay into the fund all sums contributed, or accept a sum with the privilege of retaining all sums that may be contributed.

By this plan all lecturers would be deeply interested and equity secured, and travel over back and forth over same territory avoided, and help afforded where most needed. How to obtain a steadily increasing revenue to carry on the work is a question presented for solution to your honorable body. Justice demands that all should help in the work to the extent of their ability, and not leave all the burdens to the generous wealthy, who would be more willing to giv liberally if only all evinced a little more of the first principles of Secularism—Justice! I suggest the secretary publishing in The Truth Seeker, Investigator, and Ironclad Age every month an itemized account of expenditures, with name of persons to whom and for what service money is paid.

The report was referred to the Committee on Resolutions.

Joseph Frankel took the floor to make a suggestion as to the establishment of a lecture bureau. Mr. Frankel did not think that the distribution of tracts was of so much importance as the maintenance of an activ lectureship. The Newark Union, with which Mr. Frankel was connected, was a very successful body owning its own hall. Lecturers were better than tracts in Newark because the press reported them. He believed in good lecturers, but not in cranks. Some of the speakers who came to Newark were a damage to the cause. He wanted a lecture bureau, so that cranks could be weeded out, and a circuit formed.

After Mr. Frankel's remarks the Congress adjourned till afternoon.

The afternoon session was addressed by Mr. Reynolds on "Nineteenth Century Persecutions." The evening session was addressed by Samuel P. Putnam and Charles Watts upon a "New Heaven and a New Earth," and "Theological Misconceptions," respectivly.

Saturday morning the Congress assembled to hear reports of Committees. The Committee on Resolutions and Communications reported as follows:

RESOLUTIONS.

Believing with the founders of the American Republic that civil government is a natural and secular institution, and not a divine and supernatural one; and believing, too, that the human mind in the process of government and education should be entirely free from the trammels of superstition; we, the American Secular Union, in Congress assembled at New York, do hereby resolve: That we reaffirm, as the true basis of a perpetual union, the following demands of Liberalism:

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in state legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the president of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of 'Christian' morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Resolved, That all who favor the secularization of our government be earnestly and cordially invited to unite and become activ members of the American Secular Union, and that Liberals everywhere be requested to organize local Unions, lyceums, kindergartens, and all other instrumentalities for educating children in the principles of science and Secular government.

Resolved, That universal education should be the basis of universal suffrage in this republic, to be secured under present laws and proper legislation, and finally to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution requiring every state to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

Resolved, That in the exercise of suffrage the law should recognize no sex; and that we sympathize with the movement for the enfranchisment of woman.

Resolved, That we deprecate the growing differences between the producing classes and organized monopolies, and we are in sympathy with all movements that look to a reasonable solution of these questions, upon the basis of equal and unrestrained justice.

Resolved, That we denounce the arrest in New Jersey of Charles B. Reynolds for alleged blasphemy as a dangerous attempt to strangle free speech—a disgrace to our times and even to that religion which has no rival as a persecutor for opinion's sake. We hold it to be the duty of every Freethinker in the country to do what he can for freedom by sustaining Mr. Reynolds, and thus "teach the church better than to attempt to decide metaphysical questions by brute force." We specially call the attention of Freethinkers to the danger of allowing blasphemy laws to remain upon the statute books of the country and urge them to make unceasing efforts to repeal every blasphemy law in every state in the Union. We pledge to Mr. Reynolds our sympathy, our efforts for his liberation from bonds, and our moral and financial support till he is again a free man.

Resolved, That this Congress recognize the value of the services of its secretary, Mr. Samuel P. Putnam, during the past year, not alone for the great good accomplished by his efforts for the Sunday opening of the museums—by his efforts before our legislature in behalf of impartial taxation—by the multitude of lectures he has delivered the past year—by the organization of societies—but as well for his untiring devotion to the interests of the American Secular Union and the spirit of self-sacrifice he has shown under most discouraging circumstances.

In the matter of the communications referred to your committee, we recommend that those of S. A. McGuffin of the Woman's Freethought Educational Union of America, W. F. Jamieson, Jeremiah Hacker, and Mrs. A. M. Freeman, be received, acknowledged by the secretary, and placed on file.

We recommend that the report of the chairman of the Executiv Committee be received and placed on file, and we recommend the directors of the Union to carry out such of its suggestions as are feasible and practical.

We recommend that upon the communication of the Cleveland League no further official action be taken.

The Committee on Nominations reported as follows:

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON NOMINATIONS.

Your Committee on Nominations, after careful consideration, beg leave to report as follows:

President, Courtlandt Palmer.

Vice-Presidents, D. A. Blodgett, Charles Watts, John E. Remsburg, Thaddeus B. Wakeman, Horace Seaver, John W. Black, Mrs. A. M. Freeman, Mattie P. Krekel, Jas. Parton, Wm. Algie, Titus L. Brown, Robt. C. Adams, A. T. Lilly, Dr. J. R. Monroe.

Secretary, Samuel P. Putnam.

Treasurer, Charles Eckhard.

Chairman Executiv Board, E. B. Foote, Jr.

The first choice for president was, of course, Colonel Ingersoll, but he said he did not believe in third terms. He wanted a rotation in office. His choice was J. P. Mendum, but Mr. Mendum declined to serve.

Saturday afternoon the Congress was addressed by Dr. T. L. Brown, Mrs. F. C. Reynolds, and J. J McCabe. Saturday evening John E. Remsburg, L. K. Washburn, and E. A. Stevens royally entertained the audience.

Saturday night closed the sessions of the Congress. There were no meetings Sunday till evening, when Helen H. Gardener and Robert G. Ingersoll lectured. Miss Gardener's paper was "The Pulpit, Pew, and Cradle." It will be in print, we understand, before long. Mr. Ingersoll's address was entitled "A Lay Sermon." It is the best sermon ever delivered by anybody anywhere. When he appeared the audience shook the house with applause, and the stenographic report of his sermon was so liberally sprinkled with applauding parenthetical inclosures that we cut them out to save space. The full report is given on pages 744 and 745 of this paper.

The Lay Sermon by Mr. Ingersoll.

We hav printed an extra number of this week's TRUTH SEEKER to supply the demand for the sermon of the great humanitarian preacher, Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll. This sermon deals with live issues—topics which all the country is discussing—and will be read with profound interest by everybody.

Mr. Ingersoll has been grossly slandered by the preachers lately, who allege that his teachings lead to Communism, to Socialism, and to Anarchy Their comments upon his plain statements as to his views on these matters will now be waited for with curiosity—not because the opinions of the preachers are in themselvs of any particular moment, but to see how they can find room to still misrepresent after he has told the world just how he stands.

Single copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER 7 cents; in quantities of five and over, 5 cents each.

A Sunday Law Muddle.

A queer state of affairs with relation to the observance of Sunday exists in Massachusetts. Last spring, it appears, a barber at Worcester was arrested for keeping open shop on Sunday. Judge Blodgett found him guilty and fined him, from which he took an appeal to the supreme court. On Friday, the 12th, the full bench sent down a decision holding that under the statutes no person has a right to keep open shop or do work for pay on the Lord's day. The court says:

"The object of the statute was to prohibit the opening of shops on the Lord's day for the transaction of the ordinary business carried on during the week. The legislature intended by this statute to keep the ordinary places of traffic closed on this day, so that persons who wished to rest or go to places of worship might not be disturbed. We are not called upon to pass on the question whether it is a work of necessity to cut hair or shave beards on the Lord's day. This question does not arise in the present case. We construe the statute to mean that the law prohibits the keeping open a shop, warehouse, or workhouse for the purpose of doing business therein on the Lord's day, and that it is immaterial what that business may be. The defendants are overruled."

If the law upon which this decision is founded should be strictly enforced, every place of business in Massachusetts, including, of course, drug-stores, bakeries, and restaurants, would be closed on Sunday. Last winter an act permitting bean-shops to be open until 10 o'clock A.M. passed the state legislature, but this is thought to be no protection, as the old law was not repealed—as is usually the case when a new one conflicting with it is passed—by the penal proviso saying, "All acts contrary to this act are hereby repealed." Thus, with an ironclad decision on one side and a recently passed act on the other, the authorities are in a muddle which they see no way out of. There is, however, one method, and but one, by which these Massachusetts officials can be rescued from their present perplexity. The seventh Demand of Liberalism is as follows:

"We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed."

Let this be adopted and carried out, and there would be no further difficulties about the observance of Sunday. Now, if never before, the people of Massachusetts should realize the justice and expediency of abolishing all Sabbath legislation.

Sunday Evening Meetings.

The Society of Humanity of this city will hear next Sunday evening, at 8 o'clock, in the parlors of their building, No. 28 Lafayette Place, a lecture by T. B. Wakeman. This is the first of the winter course of meetings of the Society, Mr. Wakeman delivering the first our lectures. Every Liberal in the city is invited to attend.

Henry George's New Party.

The citizens of New York who cast their ballots for Henry George in the late election assembled in mass-meeting at Cooper Union one evening recently, put forth their platform of principles, and appointed a central committee to promote organization. On this committee, with two others, is the Rev. Father McGlynn, pastor of St. Stephen's Roman Catholic church. In the main the platform is admirable, inasmuch as its framers declare themselvs "desirous of purging our political system of its corruptions, and of carrying into full effect the great principles of individual liberty proclaimed in the Declaration of Independence," and aim "to do away with all class distinctions by securing equal access to natural opportunities, and such an equitable distribution of the products of labor that all men shall be workingmen, and each shall be free to enjoy that leisure which is needful for the full development of his whole nature." Whether the makers of this platform hav any definit idea as to what constitutes individual liberty, whether they hav clearly in their minds the correct methods of bringing about the reforms they hav in view, or whether a new party would need any less purging of corruption than the old ones, are questions which time alone can answer. The placing of a clergyman on the committee certainly affords no guaranty that individual liberty is to be immediately achieved.

One of the unsettled questions concerning this new party is as to its name. The "Progressiv Democracy" is the first choice. John Swinton suggests "Union" or "Progressiv" party. The World throws out "Labor" party as a hint. Probably "National" would be as good as any; or, better still, "Cosmopolitan." This, of course, must be settled by the party itself. It is not the name which a party adopts, but the name it achieves, that is of importance.

Another matter likely to create considerable dissension is the declaration asserting, "We believe in the fatherhood of God." As a matter of fact, a great many whose sentiments this platform is supposed to embody believe in nothing of the sort, and the declaration is therefore entirely out of place. Besides, it has nothing to do with the alleged objects of the party. The affirmation that "we believe in the accessibility of the North Pole" would hav been as pertinent, and, if anything, less offensiv. As a writer in the Leader, evidently a Freethinker, says:

"Such a clause could only divide us, for the rights of unbelief are as sacred as the rights of belief. Our party embraces not those who acknowledge the fatherhood of God, but more generally those who acknowledge the brotherhood of man. Let it be remembered, at this crisis in our history, that in England, the land of toleration, Infidels and Christians hav fought and are still fighting side by side in the Chartist, Coöperativ, and Socialist movements."

Even some clergymen are clear-sighted enough to see the strength of the objection. The Rev. W. D. P. Bliss writes to John Swinton's Paper as follows:

"I see that there has been some discussion as to the advisability of declaring belief in God in the preamble to the constitution of the Progressiv Democracy party in New York. As one who is both a clergyman and yet heart and soul in favor of the present political labor movement, let me say that I hope, if there be any serious objection to the declaration of such belief, that the declaration will not be made. I believe profoundly in the fatherhood of one living and true God, but if any do not so believe, the way to win them to belief is not by hurling declarations at their heads, but by winning their hearts by proof of brotherly kindness."

The Rev. Mr. Bliss goes on to say that the cause of unbelief in God is the lives and actions of believers. Of course, no philosophical unbeliever can accept this explaation, though the lives and actions of some believers are often such as not only to destroy faith in an overruling deity, but to shake our confidence in humanity as well. Disbelief in the Christian deity, however, has a deeper source than this. It is not the inconsistency of believers, but the inconsistency of belief itself, that causes doubt.

If Mr. George's new party desires a model platform, it will expunge all declarations of faith in anything except its political principles. Again, if we may venture another suggestion, we would propose as an amendment to the platform the Nine Demands of Liberalism, printed on another page.

Nearly a year must pass before, through the uncertainties of the next election, Mr. George's party can hope to put in operation the scheme for purging our political system, and carrying into full effect the great principles of individual liberty. A movement looking to the adoption of the Nine Demands might be begun at once, or, at least, as soon as the next legislature convenes. Sixty thousand signatures to a petition for the taxation of church property could but hav a salutary effect on the lawmakers at Albany.
